With deep concentration, midget guru Dave Wilson performs the fire spitting segment of the show. Wilson has traveled with the side show for the past five years and has been practicing fire illusions for the past seven years.

As many as 200 visitors an hour duck under a tarp to view human oddities and satisfy their sense of curiosity at the Kansas State Fair's freak show in Hutchinson.

Every 15 minutes during the fair's evening hours, freak show patrons spend $1.50 each to witness what the show's host terms "the strange, the unusual, the different and the odd."

Four hundred eyes an hour witness such things as a lady putting a python's head in her mouth, another lady called "Electra" sitting in an electric chair and lighting a neon light, and "Ferdinand the Fat Man."

As the patrons enter the tent, the acts begin. A midget guru climbs a ladder of machetes, waits for applause and returns to the stage where he then stomps his feet in a box full of broken glass. He reassures the audience his act was a success by showing them his uninjured feet.

The guru is better known as fire-eater Dave Wilson. Although fire-eating may seem fascinating to some, the 25-year-old Wilson chose to make it his hobby. Seven years ago Wilson first attempted to eat fire and two years later, he had joined the circus side show act.

Temporarily losing parts of his mustache and eyebrows were all a part of the learning process, he said. Shaving his head became part of his preparation routine, and Wilson now keeps his hair cropped at a bare minimum, exposing a hand-sized tatoo on the left side of his head.

Amid the minor hair casualties, Wilson has put together a convincing act. Although he has done his fire-eating act thousands of times, the danger is always there, he said. Only a few crucial seconds exist between eating and spitting fire and the preservation of tongue and taste buds.

After dipping two fire sticks into lighter fluid, Wilson starts one with a lighter and proceeds to light his tongue on fire from the stick. Then the second stick is lit from the flame in his mouth.

The liquid layer of the lighter fluid protects his tongue for five to 10 seconds before he risks burning himself. When the liquid layer burns away, that is the crucial point, Wilson said.

The show host, "Prince of Pain," intrigues his audience by checking to see if he has a "screw loose." He then replaced the screwdriver with a 6-inch nail in the same nostril. Viewers seemed less excited when he opened the show by shoving a hat pin into his arm.

After his act is finished, he directs the audience to the opposite platform where a magician's act has been prepared.

Each attraction has its own degree of difficulty — or level of sanity — depending on one's point of view.

The Prince of Pain's performance is one of the more impressive. After threading a needle through his arm, he asks the crowd if they think he has a screw loose.

As if to confirm their positive reaction, he almost inhales a screwdriver in his nose. The act continues with him replacing the tool with a nail and asking for an audience participant to remove the nail.

The Prince said his act sometimes stumps some doctors who are incredulous until they go home and check their anatomy books. The show's host warned the children in the audience that the tricks were dangerous and they should not try them at home. The Prince then reminded the audience that the sword swallower was currently in the hospital.

The Prince, Wilson, Electra, Ferdinand and the other freak show performers will continue their show each day at the State Fair through Sunday.

Top Wildcat harriers to miss season opener

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

John Capriotti will get a good look at how much depth he has on his men's and women's cross-country teams when K-State competes in the Missouri Invitational Friday.

Capriotti, the Wildcats' first-year track and cross-country coach, is taking a varied approach to this season.

He is sending the team's top runners to only three meets in hopes that "fresh legs" will propel them to a fourth outing — the National Collegiate Athletic Association nationals.

"We are not going to be running our top group this weekend," Capriotti said. "There will be a very young group competing for us."

Capriotti said he believes if he holds his best runners to limited action during the season, he can eliminate some of the injury problems that have plagued the team in the past.

If all goes as planned, the K-State harriers can enter the post-season portion of the schedule — regional and national meets — in peak condition.

Capriotti will hold back Jacque Struckhoff, whom he is still evaluating on a daily basis as a possible redshirt candidate because of a leg injury she suffered during outdoor track season. He has also decided to redshirt Anne Stadler, who is recovering from knee injury.

Chris Vanatta and Betsy Silzer will also not make the trip to Columbia.

On the men's side, Jim Knudsen and Swedish native Jan Jonsson will be idle this weekend.

"It is a long season," Capriotti said. "I want to make sure everybody gets a good base in. Basically, it is a very low-key meet for us. We want to see how the younger individuals handle the race competition."

Despite the absence of Struckhoff and Stadler from the K-State roster, the women's field at the invitational will feature Anneli Edling, Alysun Deckert, Nancy Hoffman, Lisa Wakem, Angie Barry and Marge Eddy.

The Wildcat men's team has three runners from last year's third-place finishers at the Big Eight Conference championships — Ron Stahl, Pat Hessini and Rob Hayes — as well as David Warders, David Keller, Matt Vavala and Rodney Murrow.

Capriotti said that although he is going to limit most of his veteran runners to just three meets, he still expects to win both the men's and women's divisions of the meet. Both squads enjoy the luxury this season of having quality depth.

According to the K-State coach, the team has targeted the Wisconsin-Burger King Invitational, the Big Eight Championships, the District 5 Regionals and the NCAA nationals as their peak-performing meets this season.

"I'm still setting my goal on the Big Eight and NCAA championships where I'll need my top runners at full strength," Capriotti said.

Durham's competitive instincts reborn on volleyball court

Staff/Jeff Tuttle

K-State volleyball team member Cindy Durham works on her serve at a recent practice in Ahearn Field House. Durham joined the volleyball team after completing her eligibility on the women's basketball team where she lettered four years as a forward for the Lady Cats.

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

As autumn begins to descend on Manhattan, Cindy Durham once again finds herself practicing and competing on the hardwood floor of Ahearn Field House, just as she has for the past four years.

This year, however, something is different.

Durham, a four-year letterman on the basketball team, used up her collegiate eligibility in that sport last year. But instead of simply cheering for K-State's teams from the stands, she decided to play volleyball.

"I like to compete. I like to win," Durham said of her decision to play volleyball, a sport she hadn't competed in since high school.

"I just think (volleyball) is a lot of fun. There's a lot of work involved with it," Durham said. "It's a different type of game (than basketball). I've played volleyball since I was in the fifth grade. I've always liked the sport a lot."

Durham, a fifth-year senior who is scheduled to graduate in December, lettered twice in volleyball at Truman High School in Independence, Mo., and received all-state honors her senior year.

Four years, however, is a long time to be away from a sport.

"That was something I talked to her about prior to trying out — that she had been away from volleyball for four years," said Scott Nelson, K-State's volleyball coach.

"I knew she was a good volleyball player in high school, but the step from high school to college is much different — the level of play, the quickness," he said.

Durham appears to be adjusting, and Nelson said her previous exposure to collegiate sports has hastened the transition.

"She's starting to catch on to a lot of the things we do, and she's catching on quickly," Nelson said. "I think one of the reasons why is that she has had collegiate experience at a varsity level."

"While that doesn't help her necessarily in her volleyball, it does help her as far as her ability to concentrate and understand and (know) what is expected," he said. "She knows the routine of what an athlete's life is like. So when you factor in a lot of those things, she's making real good progress."

Nelson did say that he was somewhat hesitant when he heard of Durham's intentions to try out for the team.

"At first I wasn't real serious about it, but I wanted to extend the opportunity to her," Nelson said. "Then, as she started to practice, it became fairly obvious that she had some things that she could offer our team, so it's worked out real well. I'm real happy that she's joined us. She'll contribute to our program."

Nelson said he plans to take advantage of Durham's 6-foot-1 height and her strength.

"She's real physical, and we need physical people. We're trying to take advantage with her hitting and blocking a lot for us," he said.

But when Durham is asked about her progress, she said she is not as pleased as Nelson is.

"It's not as good as I would like," Durham said. "It's real hard for me to keep a positive attitude about it because I know I can do better. I know where to go, but my body won't go."

Many may have doubted Durham's ability to jump right into the program after a four-year layoff, but one such skeptic stood out — Durham herself.

"I guess the hardest thing for me was to show myself that I could play. I had to hang in there. I think that was the hardest thing, but the girls have helped me a lot," she said.

Durham praised her teammates, saying they have eased the transition considerably.

"They've helped me out a lot," she said. "I'd be lost if the girls weren't out there. They tell me where to go half the time. They're just really neat girls."

Durham also said she likes the team-oriented attitude she sees on

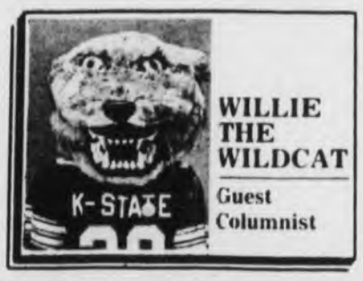
NCAA gives eligibility back to 60 NU players

By The Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — Now the only obstacles for Nebraska's football team are 10 opponents on the football field.

The Cornhuskers were relieved to learn that the NCAA Subcommittee on Eligibility Appeals restored the eligibility of 60 players who had been suspended for as many as two games.

"It eliminates any outside forces from keeping the team from attaining the goals we'd set," senior linebacker Kevin Parsons said. "We don't have to worry about being kept from winning a game because of suspensions."



Most of the suspensions were punishment for the misuse of players' complimentary game passes last season. The school appealed the penalty Tuesday, and the subcommittee decided later in the day to lift the suspensions.

"It's an example of a situation where the governing body didn't take into consideration the governed," said Parsons, who would have been suspended for one game. The players "never had a chance to say what we thought about it," he said.

Stan Parker didn't violate the complimentary pass rule, but the senior tri-captain said the appeal ruling affects him as much as any of the 60 players whose eligibility was restored.

"When one person gets hurt, everyone gets hurt," Parker said. "We need everybody out there for us to accomplish what we want. Saturday's game and most of last week were very physically and mentally demanding."

Willie the Wildcat cheers for football squad

WILLIE THE WILDCAT
Guest Columnist

How about those 'Cats?! Now before you say, "Here comes another one of those articles which makes our team sound better (or worse) than they really are," relax. My purpose here is to discuss K-State sports as I see them — and remember, 'Cats have good eyes.

Let's start with football, since I hope everyone is looking forward to Saturday night. The Northern Iowa Panthers come to town on "Band Day" for what should be a real cat fight. The Panthers return 17 starters from a team which lost in the National Collegiate Athletic Association Division I-AA semifinals last year. K-Stater's might remember last year's 10-6 setback to the Panthers as the nail that sealed Jim Dickey's coffin.

So far this year, the Wildcats have looked good, average and poor — often all in one quarter — as Coach Stan Parrish might admit. The Texas Tech game is a prime example, although the game was closer than the score. What impresses me most is the change in the team's attitude. They're enthusiastic, hard hitters and a group that won't quit.

If you were one of the 26,000 people who saw the Western Illinois game, you know what I mean. If you weren't, I hope you told your mom and dad "Hi" for me while you were at home.

Moving on, everyone should know about the hard work that our athletic administration did this summer. Parrish, basketball coach Lon Kruger, Athletic Director Larry Travis and President Jon Wefald all realize the importance of good public relations to our athletic program.

K-State has received a lot of negative, national media attention lately. Sports Illustrated reminded the nation that four of our road losses last year resulted in Homecoming victories for the other team. Also, Music Listening Lab at K-State was voted the No. 1 class in the nation for football players to take. Finally, Penthouse picked K-State in its bottom-20 survey.

By the way, the K-State cheerleaders brought back two big trophies from cheerleading camp in Memphis this summer. Me, I was the only mascot out of 54 that didn't wear a full-body suit — like that stupid Jayhawk.

Well, it's time for my daily catnap. As far as Saturday goes — here is my suggestion for your game plan.

First, go out to the Little Apple Triathalon around 9:30 a.m. and catch some sweat and pain.

Then, maybe a couple hours of studying — I said maybe!

Follow that with some K-State volleyball action at 3 p.m. against Wichita State.

Have a great time, give me a wave, and let's be proud to be Wildcats!

Punishment was fair

Editor,

Re: Tim Fitzgerald's column "Stiffer penalties should have been leveled against 'Huskers" in the Sept. 5 Collegian.

I will start with a listing of a few facts Mr. Fitzgerald missed.

1. The NCAA spent 300 to 400 hours investigating University of Nebraska and found no violations more serious than giving away complimentary passes.

2. Nebraska turned itself in and cooperated fully in the investigation.

3. Nebraska proposed in-house penalties such as the loss of two passes this season for each pass misused last season and participation in an anti-drug program at Nebraska junior and senior high schools.

In addition, a better perspective can be obtained by looking at some of the circumstances involved. One player was ruled ineligible for allowing his fiancee, who is now his wife, to use a pass. Another player was penalized for getting his Y-pal into a game.

Nebraska did not get off easy. They got the same raw deal K-State got last spring. Unfortunately, Fitzgerald missed the entire crux of the issue. The real problem is powerless, biased NCAA that attacks cooperative schools while ignoring major violations that occur at institutions that stonewall NCAA investigations.

While nailing Nebraska and K-State for minor violations, the NCAA put LSU on probation for recruiting violations, but did not revoke any scholarships, television appearances or bowl privileges.

The NCAA has become the problem in college athletics rather than the solution. The NCAA must be either reorganized or replaced in order to provide a responsible governing body for college atheltics. A step in the right direction would be the elimination of Division II and III schools from the governance of Division I affairs. The governing body must also have the power to go after big-time cheaters and a freedom from senseless rules.

In conclusion, Nebraska, like K-State, received excessive penalties for minor violations while low graduation rates and slush funds at other institutions go unpunished.

Athletics don't attract

Editor,

Tim , what makes you think K-Staters had no reason to be proud prior to (the Aug. 30 victory over Western Illinois)? Do you really think the majority of the students here feel they have to bow their heads in shame because of K-Stae's football record? Some people are under the fallacious impression that a good athletic (football) team is what will draw people to K-State. But think about it, K-State has never had a good football team (except for that one freak year we went to the Independence Bowl), yet people still have enrolled at our school. Certainly one cannot blame declining enrollment on the declining success of our football teams, for the simple reason that our football teams have never been successful enough to decline.

Maybe enrollment is down because people like Larry Travis want to increase our tuition by $15 or more per semester in order to make our sports teams "more competitive." I am interested in making our academic programs more competitive — after all, I am here for an education, not to watch a bunch of sweaty men (or women) glorify themselves by showing how much physical punishment they can take.

Also, Tim, why are you contributing to the sickening fallacy that Larry Travis is doing all his work here simply to make K-State a better place, as charity to the university? Of course Travis "kept his chin up and refused to feel sorry for himself." Travis wants to be the man who will get all the notoriety for "turning K-State athletics around."

Don't get me wrong — I am proud of K-State. But my pride is based solely on the academic excellence of the University. I am confident that the program I am in is superior to most any other like it in the country. And I am sure that many of K-State's other colleges and programs are above average, in some cases the best in the U.S.

Since we already have excellence in the area in which every university specializes — academics — why don't we capitalize on that? Let's commend the professors of K-State for their dedication to academic advancement before we exalt our athletic director. Let's commend the students of K-State for their overall good academic performance before we worship the athletes.

Tim, don't try to con me or anyone else at this University into thinking we have nothing to be proud of until we have a winning football team. We don't need that kind of attitude at this institution. Each and every student here has a reason to be proud of his or her choice of universities — K-State will give us an excellent education.

Adult students voice mutual concerns

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

Transferring credits and evening exams were among the concerns raised Wednesday at a meeting of the Association of Adults Returning To School.

Charles E. Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, led the round-table discussion about the problems older students face. Sixteen members of AARTS attended, including Ron McKiernan-Struve, senior in agricultural mechanization.

"I moved here from Iowa and had a vocal commitment that my junior college hours would transfer," McKiernan-Struve said. "The greatest frustration is the run-around I got."

Because there are no state standards, it is difficult to determine what classes are equivalent to K-State classes, Reagan said.

"Barton County accepts a literacy course for college English credit," Reagan said. "No way is that comparable to K-State's freshman English."

McKiernan-Struve said he found he could quiz-out of some courses, and some instructors assigned college credit based on the syllabus and coursework he showed them.

"Some departments won't even speak to you," he said. "I want to see some unified effort by the University."

Reagan emphasized credit can only be given by a department if a similar class is offered at K-State, no matter how rigorous the other course was.

"I hope President Wefald's recent convocation will improve faculty attitudes toward students," Reagan said.

Discussion also brought out the adult student's need for scheduling considerations with classes and tests.

"Professors seem to forget we have another life," said Diane Post, senior in biology. "Night exams are a real problem if you have children."

Reagan reminded the group of the improved services of the KSU Childcare Cooperative, and the efforts of by various departments to offer general required classes in the evening.

Daniloff's wife, Ruth, has said its participation would be "very inappropriate" — an admonition which Strobe Talbott, the Washington bureau chief of Time Magazine, said he took into consideration in deciding not to go unless the U.S. News & World Report correspondent was freed.

"I am not going to the Soviet Union to take part in an event that is supposed to advance and increase communications between the American and Soviet people while a journalistic colleague is in jail for pursuing legitimate professional obligations," Talbott told The Associated Press Tuesday.

Meanwhile, the House voted 394-0 to condemn Daniloff's imprisonment and to demand his immediate release. The Senate approved a similar resolution on Tuesday, 93-0.

Ruth Daniloff told reporters today in Moscow her husband believed his release on bail along with a Soviet held in New York would help "cool the international uproar" over his case. She said Daniloff had mentioned the idea to her on Tuesday.

Students find laptop computers useful

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

When computing came down from the mainframe, it didn't stop at the desk top — it landed in the lap.

Laptop computers, introduced into the market and in the Manhattan area two years ago, are briefcase-sized units capable of being used virtually anywhere through the use of built-in power packs.

The computer is a "natural as a data-gatherer" and "note-taker," said Neal Brecheisen, manager of Radio Shack, 2609 Anderson Ave.

Notes can be taken in class then transferred to a desk-top computer or into print, Brecheisen said.

The computers can be used as more than note-takers. They come with three basic programs, said Ken Conrow, manager of academic user services, Cardwell Hall.

Word processors can write reports or compositions; spread sheets are helpful when bookkeeping or making projections; and data bases can be used for storing information.

Although the computers may be good for note-taking, Conrow said it's the student who still determines whether the notes taken are useful.

"The problem is the balance between taking it down and understanding what is being said," Conrow said.

Virgil Wallentine, professor of computer science, said it is a personal choice of the student whether a computer is used for note-taking.

"It (taking notes with a computer) requires a certain amount of dexterity," he said. If the student is a good typist, then more polished notes can be gained by taking notes using a laptop computer.

Wallentine said he saw no problem using laptop computers in the classroom, but no policies have been formulated regarding their use.

Conrow, however, said using the computers in tests could change test-taking.

"You can put the whole world in one of those," he said, referring to the amount of information a student could possibly take to a test.

A change in the way tests are taken might be needed, he said, in order to be competitive in a world where computers are used more and more each day.

K-State, as well as the Manhattan area, is an excellent market for lap-top computers, Brecheisen said. Also, their portability makes them popular around Fort Riley.

More and more laptop computers are being sold to students, Brecheisen said. About seven to 10 units have been sold in Manhattan during the past year, bringing the total sold in the area to 30, he said.

Wally Bow, sophomore in computer science, is one of the students who owns a laptop computer.

He said he uses his for taking notes in class and for writing programs for his classes.

"With the built-in modem, I can write on the computer here (in his room) and send them to Nichols Hall," Bow said.

A program to assist in note-taking has been designed for laptop computers. Bow said he can type about as fast as he can write, but notes taken on the computer are easier to read.

However, schoolwork isn't the only thing Bow uses his laptop for. He uses the built-in spread sheet capability to keep track of his league bowling scores.

In the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, laptop computers are mainly used for word processing, said Ben Brent, professor of animal science.

"You can put it in a briefcase, take it home and do the work, (bring the computer back the next day) and dump it (the work) into the word processor," he said.

The animal sciences and industry department has a link with a computer in the Department of Statistics for use in animal research, he said.

Johnson said he has adapted the laptop computer for livestock judging contests, too.

He developed a bar code for livestock judging forms. Using a bar code reader, about 1,000 cards per hour can be handled.

The bar code is similar to the Universal Product Codes found on items in a grocery store, and the reader resembles a "fat pencil," he said.

The laptop computer was used as a translator for a larger desk-top size computer that wasn't capable of reading the bar code, Johnson said. The bar code reader scanned the contestant's card; then the laptop translated the information into a usable form the desk-top computer could understand.

The desk-top computer also was used because it could handle the data (from the bar codes) and the program needed to sort the data from the contest, Johnson said.

Laptop computers could be changing the way students take notes and study. Since their introduction two years ago the use of laptop computers is becoming common in the classroom because of their versatility.

New mini-computer lightweight, portable

By Changing Times
The Kiplinger Magazine

What's smaller than a briefcase, faster than a ballpoint pen and quieter than a typewriter? Answer: A lightweight, battery-powered portable computer.

Sized to sit on your lap, it lets you type a report while you're on a trip, send and receive messages, perform calculations and keep track of appointments, phone numbers and other data. Some models with a disk drive can even run IBM PC software.

Students, writers and business people who don't need to use IBM PC software may be happy with a laptop priced below $1,000. Although it won't run IBM PC software, it can exchange data with an IBM or other computers either by phone (if each computer has a modem) or by connecting the computers with a $40 RS-232C cable.

Both the Radio Shack Model 100 and the NEC 8201 cost less than $500 and weigh less than four pounds. You just turn on the computer and punch a couple of keys to start typing. The display shows eight lines at a time and the memory will store at least 10 pages of single-spaced text. You can send text or data by phone to another computer, plug in a standard computer printer or attach a disk drive to store data on floppy disks.

Most of the features of the original, suitcase-size Kaypro computer are packed into the 10-pound, $800 Bondwell 2. It displays 25 lines at a time and has WordStar and other software programs built in, plus a disk drive.

A problem with most laptop portables is their hard-to-read screens, which usually have a liquid crystal display (LCD) with poor contrast. Among the best are LCDs on new models from Grid and Data General.

You can't use a portable for more than 20 hours or so before the batteries have to be recharged or replaced. Most models with a disk drive wear down the batteries in 10 hours or less.

Some portables also have a set of rechargeable batteries permanently installed inside to power the memory that retains your text and data when the computer is turned off. These get recharged whenever the computer is on. In certain models the memory could lose battery power and drop whatever you're storing if you leave it turned off for several days.

Changing Times suggests you look for a model with a quiet keyboard if you plan to use it in a classroom, conference room or airplane. You need permission from the airline to use your laptop during a flight.

The $499 Tandy Radio Shack Model 100 has been around since 1983 and shows no signs of disappearing. Tandy's latest version, the Model 102, is slightly lighter and thinner. You might find either version on sale for $399.

"Text" word processing — one of five software programs built into the Model 100 — is easy to learn and use, but you have to transfer the text to another computer to print double-spaced lines or set margins.

The NEC 8201 is essentially the same as the Model 100 but has no built-in modem. NEC sells a separate modem for $80, and the user can increase the 16K RAM to 64K for $390.

The $799 Radio Shack Model 200 is similar to the 100 but displays 16 lines, compared with just eight on the Model 100 and NEC 8201. Multiplan spreadsheet software is built into the Tandy 200, along with essentially the same software that's in the 100.

The Model 100, 200 and NEC 8201 all display just 40 characters per line across the screen, which makes the letters larger and more readable than is found on under-$1,000 portables with 80 characters per line.

Cancer

Farmers who expose themselves to more chemicals by using spray equipment to apply the herbicides had an 80 percent higher risk than those who used safer application methods, the study said.

Robel said it may be important in the future to develop different and safer forms of the herbicides such as granular forms which do not vaporize or penetrate the skin.

Also, the study found that farmers who used herbicides before 1946 had a 70 percent higher risk than farmers who began using the products in the 1950s and 1960s.

Robel said the reasons for these results is "it takes about 15 to 20 years for cancer to develop. It is an age factor that increases the risks for older farmers."

He said he doubted there will be an increase in the percentage of future cancer cases related to use of herbicides because "farmers take more precautions now which will reduce their risks of developing cancer."

Robel also said he doubted whether the use of herbicides will decrease in the future.

"In the last few years, we have gone to minimum tillage which requires more herbicides," he said. "If we decrease the use of herbicides we will have to increase cultivation. This will lead to soil erosion and an increase in the amount of fuel used. Economics dictate reality."

Use of herbicides and the exposure to them is widespread in the United States, with the chemicals found even in lawn and garden herbicides. However, Robel said, there is no real danger with lawn and garden herbicides because they are only used about twice a year.

Therefore, Robel said, there is not a dangerous amount of exposure to the herbicides.

The study may have some impact on the debate surrounding Agent Orange which was used in Vietnam, because phenoxy herbicides were used in that chemical agent.

Robel said their study will probably be used in court concerning this issue, although he doesn't know how valid the application is. He said studies concerning Agent Orange are approached in a different manner, and the study he was involved in would be hard to apply to the study of Agent Orange because of those differences.

Range

"We don't have any suspects."

Saline County Sheriff Wally George said the killings were "definitely hit and go" and that the fact they took place at a firing range could hamper investigators.

"It is a public range and is used a lot, which also happens to mean there are hundreds of shell casings all over the area," George said.

He said people living near the range are accustomed to hearing gunshots so probably would not have noticed anything unusual Tuesday afternoon.

Two rifles found at the scene, one a .30-06-caliber, the other a .22, were believed to have been those of Burford and Vanderlinden.

Charles Vanderlinden of Sedalia said his brother went to the range to test a newly repaired deer rifle.

The bodies of Vanderlinden and Burford were found in the back seat of Vanderlinden's car. Watson's body was nearby in the parking lot, and Griffith's was in the woods, 50 to 100 yards away.

Durham

the squad.

"I just think everybody wants to win. There are not any jealousies," she said.

"You have to play as a team. There aren't any individuals, and I really like that part of it."

Durham said some of the skills she acquired from her years on the basketball squad have been extremely helpful in volleyball as well. She cited the emphasis on weight training in basketball, among other things, as being a great help.

"Our weight program in basketball is real good. I think it really helped me a lot. It hasn't taken me as long to adjust because of that," she said.

"The basketball movements are similar to volleyball movements in certain ways," she added. "It's a game where there's more endurance, but still you have to be quick to play defense on the post. In that way it's similar."

Durham was not a complete stranger to the squad when she showed up for the opening day of practice in August.

"I've been watching (the volleyball team) for four years. I used to come to every match when I was playing basketball, so I pretty much knew what they were doing, what kinds of things they were trying to do. I've been keeping in touch with K-State volleyball," she said.

Durham said she hasn't set any individual goals for herself during the season, other than helping the team.

"I just want to help them do better. I want to help them realize their goals," she said.

"I don't know what role I have to play yet, but (I'll do) anything I can do to help this team win."

The volleyball team's next outing is Friday and Saturday at the 10th annual K-State Invitational in Ahearn Field House.

Athletics' coliseum funding to come from Foundation

By DARLA RYAN
Collegian Reporter

University President Jon Wefald addressed Student Senate Thursday night on issues concerning funding in the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

A question about whether the athletic department would be able to meet its funding obligation for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum was brought up by Catherine Sayler, senior in veterinary medicine.

"I think that the athletic department realizes that it doesn't have the money," Wefald said. "My feeling is that the foundation will have to come up with the $2 million."

Wefald also said he will leave the issue of a proposed athletic fee for 1987 up to the athletic department and the Student Governing Association.

In March of 1984, the coliseum program committee revised the budget because of the loss of state funding and designated a $7.1 million contribution from alumni, $7 million from students and $2 million from the athletic department. The most recent project estimates determine the cost to be $15.6 million.

"We knew two years ago that the (athletic) department would not be able to raise the whole amount and arrangements were made back then to advance the money to them," said Art Loub, KSU Foundation executive director in a phone interview Thursday evening.

The KSU Foundation already has the money to cover the advancement of funds to the athletic department, Loub said.

Athletic Director Larry Travis said the exact amount of money the foundation will have to loan the department is still under negotiation.

Leader fears liquor amendment will 'dry up' before election time

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The leader of the group pushing for adoption of a liquor-by-the-drink amendment to the Kansas Constitution says his allies are "taking it for granted" the proposal will pass in the Nov. 4 general election and he's worried a last-minute effort by dry forces will again defeat the measure.

Clayton Hunter, executive director of Kansans for Effective Liquor Control, is having flashbacks to 1970 when a similar liquor amendment lost by just 11,000 votes. He's afraid his supporters are apathetic about the issue and he's trying to raise money for a advertising campaign during the final weeks before the election.

"What we really need is enough money to run two weeks of television, which of course is very, very expensive," Hunter said. "We've set a goal for the remainder of the campaign of $300,000. We intend to spend (it) on our media campaign."

Hunter is hitting up owners of restaurants, hotels and motels along with others who would benefit from the amendment, which would lift a state ban on open saloons to allow liquor-by-the-drink in restaurants.

"We're in the process of trying to raise that money," Hunter said. "We obviously don't have it now. The next two or three weeks are going to be crucial to the success of the campaign, whether or not we can get enough dough to do it."

Public opinion polls which show widespread support for the change, as they did in the weeks prior to the 1970 referendum, are the root of the problem, he said.

Studies uncertain on nuclear winter

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

A nuclear winter would, without question, follow a nuclear war, but the intensity and duration of its effects are extremely uncertain, said George Carrier, chairman of the National Academy of Science study group on nuclear winter.

Carrier, professor of applied mathematics at Harvard University, spoke to an audience of about 500 Thursday in McCain Auditorium during the first University Convocation series lecture of the semester.

"Nuclear winter is a phrase invented to subsume the possibility that smoke...generated by fires...(from) the use of nuclear weapons, would appear in sufficient quantity to block out sunlight so strongly that the atmosphere would get cold enough to be of some concern," Carrier said at a press conference Thursday.

Throughout the convocation address, Carrier stressed the uncertainty of current scientific models used to project the possibility and effects of a nuclear winter. He said figures cited in the address represented "ranges of possibility."

"Hypothetical case studies are nothing more than 'for-instances' and you must understand that."

He said the data studied was factual but was not exact because only an actual nuclear war could produce concrete figures.

Phenomena such as forest fires are studied to learn about smoke emission from wood products. However, uncertainty arises because during a nuclear exchange, the burning of petroleum products from the abundance of destroyed autos and gas stations would produce a greater amount and different type of smoke, he said.

Although estimates on the amount of smoke in the atmosphere vary, scientists base calculations of impact on a "middle-ground figure" of 180 million tons of smoke, he said.

Carrier said current models do not consider the uneven distribution of smoke in the atmosphere which could allow sunlight to shine through breaks between the clouds.

In addition, current scenarios do not account for the influence of oceans. Moisture from the oceans could clear smoke from the atmosphere's lower level, and warmth could offset some of the cold, he said.

In assessing research on the actual temperature drop that would be experienced in a nuclear winter, Carrier said earlier studies have shown the temperature could fall as much as 40 degrees Celsius while more recent research indicates a decline of about 4 or 5 degrees Celsius.

The impact of the temperature drop would depend on the time of year of a nuclear exchange, Carrier said.

"The degree to which the temperature in Manhattan, Kansas, would be lowered during the three months following a nuclear exchange...is very dependent on the season," he said.

Carrier said if the temperature decline occurred in the fall or winter, crops would not be affected; but if the decline occurred in the spring, even a 4 degree temperature drop would destroy the potential harvest.

Overall, Carrier said, even if the effects of nuclear winter are calculated as minimal, their impact would still be more severe than the common tragedies in individual's lives. Perhaps, he said, the impact could be almost as serious as the destruction caused by the detonation of nuclear weapons.

Since nuclear winter is a hypothetical problem, the best way to confront it is to prevent a nuclear war, Carrier said.

"Our first priority as a nation or as a globe should be that we never get ourselves in a position...that could possibly lead to the use of those weapons," he said.

George Carrier ponders a question during a press conference prior to the University Convocation address. Carrier spoke about the possibility of nuclear winter resulting from the effects of a major nuclear exchange.

U.S. forces may fight drug battle

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House, debating a massive anti-drug bill, approved an amendment Thursday that would require U.S. troops to be sent to the nation's borders and would give them power to arrest drug smugglers.

The vote was 237-177 for the proposal as House members rejected arguments that it was unconstitutional to give U.S. troops civilian police enforcement authority.

Supporters said the amendment contained constitutional safeguards, and they argued that civilian enforcement agencies are unable to cope with massive numbers of ships and planes carrying drugs.

The House also voted 242-171 for an amendment that would give state and local law enforcement agencies a bonanza in federal grants to fight illegal drugs.

The original bill would have allocated $300 million for the grants in fiscal years 1987 and 1988, but the change sponsored by Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., would raise the figure to $1.3 billion. In addition, the amendment would reduce the 50 percent matching figure for states and localities to 10 percent.

"The real front-line troops have to be the local law enforcement personnel," Rangel said. But Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif. said "This is the kitchen sink amendment ... just throw in the kitchen sink, half-a-million dollars, just like that."

The overall legislation would escalate the war on drugs by pouring billions of dollars into enforcement, education, rehabilitation, crop eradication, and withholding of aid from recalcitrant producer countries.

The amendment involving use of troops was offered by Reps. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif. and Tommy Robinson, D-Ark. It not only orders deployment of military personnel, but requires the president to halt drug

Animal society official files report accusing local kennel of violations

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

A Manhattan kennel might be violating state statutes and not meeting minimum U.S. Department of Agriculture requirements dealing with dog care, said Ann Gonnerman, president of the National Society for the Protection of Animals.

Gonnerman visited the H & W Kennel, 2200 Fort Riley Blvd., Wednesday and said she saw possible conditions there that might not be in compliance with state and federal animal regulations.

However, H & W Kennel is not governed by USDA because John White, owner of the kennel, said he does not sell dogs across state lines.

"I am talking about minimum federal standards that most kennels and animal research facilities go by," Gonnerman said.

Although White's kennel is not subject to USDA inspection, he might be in violation of state statutes regarding animal cruelty, Gonnerman said.

A report was filed Wednesday night by Gonnerman at the Riley County Police Department describing the conditions at the kennel.

"I saw conditions that are conducive to disease," Gonnerman said. "The kennel did not appear to be sanitized according to USDA regulations on a regular basis, either."

Gonnerman said she saw other potential problems at the kennel.

Some undesirable conditions she noted were cobwebs hanging from the cages, little artificial lighting with no windows in some of the rooms, animal cages stacked on top of each other with no solid partition between the cages, no American Kennel Club identification of the animals, debris outside the kennel area, cracked and improperly treated concrete, and insufficient help at the clinic.

"I think the cobwebs showed that the kennel is not properly sanitized," she said.

Views differ on economic impact

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Different economic interpretations have resulted in a controversy over the impact the decline in enrollment has on Manhattan's economy.

A negative impact estimate of $100 million by Jerry Mills, coordinator of the Greater Manhattan Scholarship Program, was much too high, said a K-State extension specialist.

Darling was referring to an example in an article in Tuesday's Collegian which stated that a decline in enrollment by 3,000 students has caused Manhattan an annual loss of nearly $100 million since 1982.

Mills estimated if 3,000 students had each spent $5,000 a year on living expenses in Manhattan, and each dollar had turned over six times in the community, nearly $100 million would have been added to the economy each year.

"My job is to educate people on economic development," Darling said. "One of the most abused economic concepts is that of the turnover and the multiplier."

The fact that a dollar changes hands, or turns over, six times does not make the net effect an income multiplier of $6, he said.

This is because a part of every dollar "leaks" out of the community with each turnover, Darling said. After the money has been spent and respent six times, a large portion of it has leaked from the community.

Because multipliers will seldom get higher than two, Darling said, a closer approximation of the negative impact the decline in enrollment to Manhattan's economy would be $30 million instead of $100 million.

Darling said although he disagreed with the dollar figures,

Grant to promote literacy efforts

WASHINGTON — The Gannett Foundation and USA Today on Thursday announced a $2 million, two-year competitive grant program aimed at strengthening adult literacy efforts.

The grants are designed to promote cooperation among literacy groups so they can pool resources, unify their efforts and ultimately reach more non-reading adults, said Eugene C. Dorsey, Gannett Foundation president.

Dorsey estimated that 60 million adult Americans lack basic literacy skills, and that the number is growing by about 2 million a year.

"We're not talking here about reading novels or writing personal essays. We're talking about understanding medicine labels and filling out job applications," Dorsey said.

The program, called the Literacy Challenge, will award grants of $40,000 to $100,000 in the first year for proposals to launch or expand statewide literacy coalitions or other organizations. In the second year, some grants will be renewed and new grants will be awarded. No more than one grant a year will be awarded per state.

President of CBS News resigns

The resignation came one day after network founder William S. Paley and Laurence A. Tisch, the company's major stockholder, forced the resignation of Thomas H. Wyman as chairman and chief executive officer.

Sauter's resignation was announced minutes after CBS board member Walter Cronkite had said that a change in the news division's leadership appeared inevitable.

Sauter earlier this year laid off 70 news employees as part of a general reduction in the CBS workforce and was criticized openly by star employees such as Bill Moyers and Andy Rooney for not insulating the news division from the pressures of profits and ratings.

Officials plea for cancer victims

WASHINGTON — Senators and cancer specialists pleaded Thursday for the lives of six cancer-stricken "refuseniks," pressing Soviet officials to let the victims rejoin their families and seek medical treatment in the West.

"The request is very simple: Give them a chance to live," Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who has written two letters asking Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev to let the patients leave.

"The tragedy of their illness should not be compounded by political considerations. They should be allowed to leave while there is still time," said Dr. Bruce Chadner, head of the National Cancer Institute.

Pakistanis detain man for hijacking

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Authorities questioned a man with a Libyan passport Thursday about last week's seizure of a Pan Am jetliner, and sought a companion who fled into a Palestinian mission.

Officials said a man identified as Salman Taraki was seized Wednesday at Islamabad airport in connection with the seizure of the Boeing 747 in Karachi last Friday.

They said his Libyan passport appeared to be a forgery, but that they had no evidence against him yet.

Twenty people were killed and more than 100 injured when the four hijackers of the Pan Am jet panicked and opened fired indiscriminately at the passengers and crew.

Inspector Javed Mirza, who arrested Taraki, told The Associated Press that police were watching the Palestine Liberation Organization mission in Islamabad, the capital, for a man who had been traveling with Taraki. The man eluded authorities at the airport and went to the PLO mission, where police could not follow because of its diplomatic immunity.

The government, meanwhile, announced that Air Marshal Shabbir Hussain Syed, the deputy commander of the air force had been appointed to investigate the takeover and the way officials handled it.

It was the first official indication that mistakes may have been made in ending the bloody standoff, which came when the airplane's auxiliary power system faltered and the gunmen began firing at their approximately 400 hostages.

Carlin offers reward for leads

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin authorized a $5,000 reward Thursday for information leading to an arrest and conviction in the August stabbing death of Lora Beth Williamson of Garden City.

Williamson was found stabbed to death in a cornfield four miles southwest of Garden City on Aug. 17. An investigation by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation and the Finney County Sheriff's office has turned up more than 110 leads.

However, law enforcement efforts have failed to turn up "logical suspects in this case," KBI director Tom Kelly said in a letter to Carlin requesting the reward offer.

"The entire community and the surrounding area has been shocked by the commission of this crime and it is imperative that positive information be developed to identify and bring to justice the person or persons who murdered Lora Beth Williamson," Kelly said.

"The reward will clearly be an inducement for anyone with knowledge of this homicide to come forward with valuable information."

Anyone with information is urged to contact the KBI hotline at 1-800-KS-CRIME, or the Finney County Sheriff's office.

Freshman becomes leader for the day

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

Jill Warren was more than a freshman in modern languages Thursday. She was student body president.

The president-for-a-day event, which was sponsored by the Student Senate Communications Committee, was the invention of Candy Leonard, junior in home economics and mass communications and chairman of the committee.

"The committee's No. 1 goal is to improve public relations for student government," Leonard said. "The president-for-a-day event helps to impress upon students how important it really is."

Warren said she wasn't sure why student government sponsored an event like this.

"Part of me thinks they just want to play a joke on freshmen," she said, "but part of me thinks they want freshmen to get involved."

"My roommate said, 'if something like this would happen to anyone, it would happen to you,'" Warren said.

A drawing was conducted Sept. 7 at the Activities Carnival for all freshmen interested in being in the student body president's shoes for one day. Nearly 200 names were in the hat by the end of the carnival, Leonard said.

"We wanted to generate interest in student government among freshmen because they won't have a chance to be a part until elections this year," Leonard said.

Warren said she went to the Activities Carnival only because a friend was going.

"I looked at all the unusual booths and signed up for all the drawings," Warren said.

"The sign said something about freshmen, then 'be student body president for a day.' I thought that sounded fun," she said.

"I never thought they'd call me," she said. "I've never won a drawing before. But my friends say that even if it wasn't a drawing, it's something I'd sign up for anyway."

The committee made up Thursday's itinerary for Warren. She met the Student Governing Association staff, University President Jon Wefald and other University administrators.

She attended an administrative meeting, a celebration in her honor, a meeting of the student body president's cabinet and a Student Senate meeting.

Most of the time, Warren was the sidekick of Steven Johnson, junior in agriculture economics and the real student body president, she said.

"We want to give exposure to student government — fun exposure," Leonard said. "We're not just serious legislators. We try to stay in touch with students."

"Not many freshmen meet upperclassmen," she said. "I'm lucky because I get to meet some who make the rules."

Leonard would like to see another student have the experience sometime later this semester, closer to election time, she said.

Peres, Mubarak meet, discuss Mideast peace

By The Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Egypt — Prime Minister Shimon Peres and President Hosni Mubarak held the first Israeli-Egyptian summit meeting in five years Thursday in an effort to revive the quest for Middle East Peace.

The two leaders, dispensing with aides and interpreters, talked privately in English for several hours in this Mediterranean port.

The two shook hands cordially as they met at the Ras el-Tin presidential palace beside the Mediterranean Sea shortly after Peres arrived from Tel Aviv. Alexandria was the site of the last Israeli-Egyptian summit meeting, in August 1981 between Egypt's Anwar Sadat and Israel's Menachem Begin.

Moslem extremists assassinated Sadat two months later.

Egypt is the only Arab nation with diplomatic relations with Israel, and any overture to the Jewish state is considered a political gamble for Mubarak.

During a working lunch at which the Israeli leader was the guest of Mubarak's prime minister, Aly Lutfy, Peres said, "New and fresh substance has to be introduced between our two peoples. Israel does not want to impose anything on Egypt, but both countries want to overcome the desert that lies between them."

Peres' spokesman Uri Savir said there was no formal agenda for the meeting. Another Israeli official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that was by mutual consent. Peres is scheduled to leave for home Friday.

"Both sides wanted an open-ended dialogue," the official said. "We view this as a positive thing which indicates Egypt's willingness to listen."

Mubarak has said he envisioned the summit as primarily a forum for discussion of the Palestinian question.

Peres said before leaving Israel, "We shall not permit the peace process to die away or fade away, and we shall do whatever we can to bring life and spirit to the momentum for peace."

This summit, hailed as the beginning of warmer relations, was made possible by an agreement, signed Wednesday, to submit a nagging dispute over the 250-acre border enclave of Taba to international arbitration.

Speaking at the working lunch, both Peres and Lutfy said the Palestinian issue would be discussed during the summit.

Peres said at the lunch that U.N. Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 should serve as a basis for peace talks. But neither is acceptable to Palestinian leaders because both refer to the Palestinians as refugees and not a people with a right to self-determination.

Peres said Israel is willing to discuss the idea of an international peace conference, an Arab proposal strongly supported by Egypt and Jordan but unattractive to the United States and Israel because it would involve the Soviet Union.

"The Palestinians have a right to participate in the determination of their own future," Peres said, underscoring a tenet of the Camp David accords signed in 1978 by Israel, Egypt and the United States. The document formed the basis for the 1979 peace treaty between the two Middle Eastern neighbors, but its clause on Palestinian self-determination in territory occupied by Israel remains unfulfilled.

Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir is to swap jobs with Peres in October under a power-sharing agreement between Peres' Labor Party and Shamir's rightist Likud Bloc.

Libyan bombing fails to restrain terrorism

Once again, what President Reagan thought were good intentions brought no results.

After recent terrorist attacks on a synagogue in Istanbul, Turkey, as well as the Pan Am jet hijacking in Karachi, Pakistan, one must draw the painful conclusion that despite the bombing of Libya and Reagan's warnings to "those states sponsoring terrorism," the Reagan administration's war on terrorism has been largely unsuccessful.

The fundamental problem behind most terrorist attacks, including the Karachi and Istanbul incidents, is the struggle of the Palestinian people to regain their homeland. Reagan's comments condemning "state-sponsored terrorism" must have an ironic ring to Palestinians, a people without a state.

Unfortunately, Israel also refuses to recognize the problem of international terrorism in this context. Instead, it sees the solution as little more than the total destruction of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

As Michael C. Hudson, director of the Center for Contemporary Arab Studies at Georgetown University has stated, "Recognition of the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people and American willingness to discuss the establishment of a Palestinian state — which is what the United States supported when it backed the creation of Israel in a U.N. resolution in 1947 — would...provide momentum for a peace process."

As many innocent people including the passengers of the hijacked Pan Am flight and Jews in the Istanbul synagogue have found, attempting to eliminate the problem of international terrorism without addressing the issues behind that problem is not only unrealistic, but dangerous.

In less than two months elections will be conducted and many people will wish they had been keeping up with the candidates and issues.

The decision by potential voters to stay away from the polls because of unfamiliarity with the issues is a contributing factor to low voter turn-out.

The University offers innumerable resources on issues, and a forum for discussion to which the average voter doesn't have access. Therefore, it's particularly important for students, faculty and staff to consider the issues and vote.

To aid the campus community in its candidate research, The Collegian will be publishing information Monday about candidates and their platforms, along with an explanation of the issues. Student reactions to a survey will also appear. Subjects covered in the survey include pari-mutuel betting, liquor by the drink, a Kansas lottery and students' preference between gubernatorial candidates Republican Mike Hayden and Democrat Tom Docking.

Being informed is the most important step in voting, but forgetting to register is the most frequent excuse for not voting.

Students can avoid missing the voter registration deadline by registering in the Student Government Services Office before Oct. 14. A valid identification card proving the student is 18 years or older is required for registration.

This is the first year the Riley County Clerk's Office has offered voter registration on campus. The county should be commended for this action and students should take advantage of the opportunity.

Taxpayers fund trips for Kansas legislators

It's not much fun to foot the bill when someone else is taking the trip.

That's exactly what Kansas taxpayers do every time state legislators take off on another "mission" or attend seminars and meetings in Washington, D.C.

During the year ending June 30, state legislators spent $182,215 in a quest for new markets for Kansas commodities. The question is, did they find enough new markets to justify the expense of trips to seminars and to foreign countries?

One of the most expensive trips was a two-week mission to China in May by Sen. Joe Harder, R-Moundridge. The trip cost taxpayers $4,208. The China mission was one of six trips made by Harder, who also traveled to seminars of the National Conference of State Legislators.

If China expands its imports of American grain next year, the trip will more than pay for itself. If, however, China fails to expand imports or even decreases imports, the state's hurting economy will cringe.

The state is not only awaiting the results of that single trip; House Majority Leader Jim Braden, R-Clay Center, along with Gov. John Carlin and several other state officials, took a "hectic, 11-day trip" in Braden's words, to Europe. Braden said the party made several trade contacts while in Europe, and he said he believes the money was well spent.

Before legislators take more of these trips, they must be cautioned. Kansans will be watching exports as well as the words of their leaders.

East, West discover common goals

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

I remember writing in my journal in the lobby of Hotel Svestapol in Moscow when the two students walked by. One greeted me in Russian and smiled as I responded in German that my Russian vocabulary was about three words richer than my Swahili.

My accent betrayed me, and both their eyes brightened when they discovered I was American.

"Do you have time to talk to us?" they asked in perfect German. "We're from the German Democratic Republic and have never spoken with an American before."

And so, over a bottle of Russian Champagne (theirs) and a pack of Marlboros (mine), we discussed and debated societies and ideals until dawn.

We didn't waste too much time on trivialities, as I now recall, and soon I found myself involved in a fundamental discussion with two dedicated socialists.

When asked, I told them the most important right in our society is the right to freedom of speech. The foundation of democracy is the free exchange of ideas (like what I'm writing now or the many letters each of you may write in response); it is no coincidence that freedom of speech is guaranteed by the very first amendment in the U.S. Bill of Rights.

Not only those students, but also other East Germans have told me their most important right is the right to a job. Everyone has the right to an occupation whereby he can earn food, clothing and shelter.

My first response was, "But are your workers motivated?" "What about the quality of your food or housing?" As an economics professor of mine will tell you, "I can solve our unemployment problem today; we'll just outlaw tractors! Everybody would then have a job, but would we be better off?"

The answer I received that night in Moscow was, "It's a question of what problems a society wants to have. You (Americans) have some motivated workers, but also many people who have no jobs. We give everyone a job, and then we worry about motivating them."

Later I was asked, "What good is freedom of speech if people don't have enough to eat? Freedom to demonstrate isn't much defense against the cold."

"True," I replied, "but what are beings which are well taken care of physically, yet mentally restricted in their thought? Somewhat like cattle, I should think."

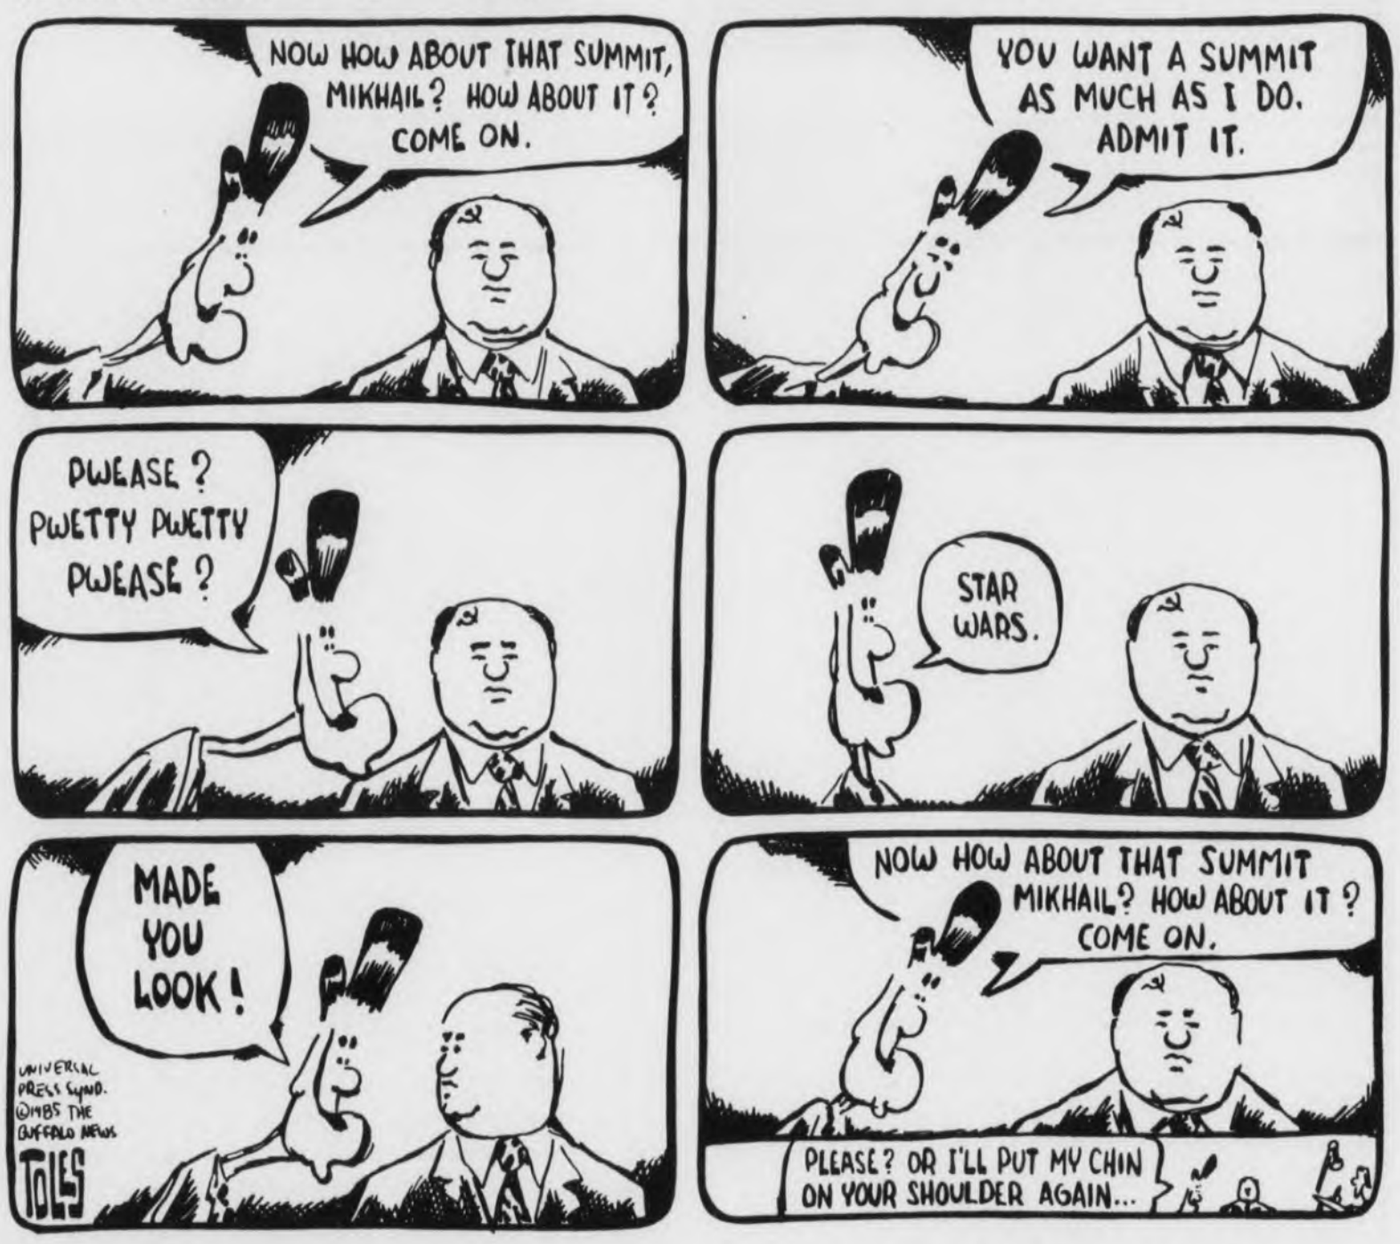
I think some core ideas had been brought out at this point. Obviously, what we'd all like to see is a society where both political freedoms and the basic physical needs of all are secured. Those of you adept at argumentation tactics recognize that I have now assumed the classic "fence-sitting" position of democratic socialism.

Perhaps some fences were meant to be sat on. Maybe if we all sat on the fence — or the Wall, as it were — we'd all see the other side a little clearer and realize our goals aren't that far apart.

Please do not let my conviction that East and West can meet on the common ground of a social democracy lead you to think I mean East and West are equally advanced toward that goal.

There is no question in my mind that most Western industrial societies enjoy more political freedom and a higher standard of living than the Eastern-bloc nations. One of the products of our motivated work force, for example, is technological advancement. With few exceptions, people look to the West, not the East, for new ideas and new products.

Despite the advantages we enjoy in the West, I felt uncomfortable when asked, "Why has your poverty rate steadily increased in the 1980s?" What would you do, tell someone that 35 million citizens of the wealthiest country on the planet live in poverty because they're lazy? Such easy answers may help the wealthy sleep at night, but they don't tend to convince people involved in a rational debate.



I told them we do have a poverty problem and that the government needs to do more.

One thing that discussion in Moscow and others like it convinced me of was the East Germans' desire to better their own society. I realize this contradicts my thoughts on trash in Monday's column, but I met many hard-working people wanting to build an equitable country — especially the young people.

I was told numerous times, "We just wish our government would trust us more; let us travel to the West. We'd come back." Based on what I heard and saw, I believe the vast majority would. The notion that most of the people living in the Soviet bloc hate their societies and would rush to the West, if only they could, just isn't true.

Everyone I met in the East, from hard-core Communists to those who did hate it there, expressed the common desire for peaceful coexistence with the West. Funny, I think Westerners feel the same way toward the East.

So why are we still fighting each other?

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

What do you remember about the good manners your mother tried to teach you? Anything at all?

Do you remember the tries she made at teaching you to:

— keep your elbows off the table?
— use your napkin?
— write thank-you notes?
— sit up straight?
— say "thank you," and "please," and "excuse me?"
— never talk with your mouth full?
— never pick your nose in public?
— cover your mouth when you yawn or sneeze?
— respect your elders?
— ...(you fill in the blank)?
— be polite?

Neither do I.

I don't remember the myriad of attempts my mother made to teach me good manners, but I do remember the results — at least most of the time.

Why is it so difficult to teach a small child to remember good manners? Why is it so nice when a young child remembers all the things mother taught him or her? And why is it so annoying when a teen-ager forgets everything and does whatever he or she pleases?

I know the exuberance of youth has something to do with the first point. The second point can be attributed to mother's continued efforts and the child's desire to please mom. And naturally, the trials and tribulations of adolescence explain the last point.

Why is it impossible for older adolescents (i.e. college students) to remember all those good manners mom went to such trouble to teach us? I don't mean the ones about covering your mouth when you yawn or the ones about table manners. What I'm most concerned with are basic common courtesies — the ones not listed above.

Why do we forget there are other people in the world in addition to ourselves? Why do we seem to assume we are the only ones who make a difference? It really shouldn't be that difficult to remember common courtesy when we're such grown-up, mature adults.

So why is there still a problem?

Because we forget too easily. We forget other people have rights, too; that each and every one of us deserves common courtesy and respect.

It's very easy to forget people are probably walking behind you on a stairway, so it's easy to stop in the middle of major traffic flow and carry on an intense discussion of who the best-looking man in English class is. It's easy to stop at the top of the stairs and mutter as the person behind you executes a quick and abrupt left turn around you, brushing your arm in the process.

"Did you see that guy? He almost ran into me!" But, of course, you don't remember that the top of the stairs happen to be a major traffic area and the poor guy didn't stand a chance. He was caught between a rock and a hard place, even before he reached the top of the stairs. After all, you wouldn't stop your car in the middle of an intersection, would you?

And it's very easy to forget the sidewalk doesn't expand simply because you and two friends are walking together, side by side. Why should you move because some poor soul is going in the opposite, henceforth wrong, direction? Wouldn't it be simpler for that person to end up in the grass, mud, street, or wherever, instead of you and your friends moving a couple of inches?

And it's very easy to forget how easily a glass bottle (once containing the warming liquid you take to the football games) can break when thrown from the upper rows of KSU Stadium toward the field. What happens if that bottle hits someone in the head or crashes to the cement in the middle of a crowd? And it's easy to forget that the beer cans thrown from the same section can easily hit someone in the back of the head. (You can substitute "frisbee," "football," "beach ball," or whatever in place of "beer cans.")

Why is it so easy to forget, when we reach college, all the good manners, common courtesy and common sense our mothers (and fathers) tried so hard to teach us? Is it that we're away from home, sometimes for the very first time, and besides "everyone is doing it?"

Just because you're away from home, on your own, and all your "friends" are doing whatever, does that mean you have to?

Shouldn't college be the time when we remember all those neat little things our parents taught us and really learn what it's like to be on our own? Shouldn't college be the time to remember good manners, common courtesy and common sense so we can learn what's waiting for us in the real world? Shouldn't college be a time of remembering other people, of learning about other people, of learning about ourselves?

Shouldn't college be a time of individualized searching for our identities, our individualism, our own way of living, and our own means of non-conformity?

Leadership in science education dean's aim

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Faculty and administration in the College of Education are striving to make the college a national leader in science education, said Dean of Education David Byrne.

Change of 'State'

"Just last spring the Kansas Board of Regents approved the University's proposal for a center for the study of science education," Byrne said.

"The College of Education will play a major role in this, but the colleges of engineering, arts and sciences, agriculture and veterinary medicine will be involved, too," he said. "We (the college) can't be a national leader on our own. We're very enthusiastic about support from other colleges."

Byrne said the improvement efforts in science education will gain added support next year when Provost Owen Koeppe will begin helping with the program.

"Koeppe, who is a biochemist and taught biochemistry, will add substantial strength to the center for science education," Byrne said.

Two new assistant professors are also hoped to be a helpful addition to the science education program, Byrne said.

Angelo Collins recently completed her doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. Collins has a minor in human genetics and has worked in areas of problem solving using artificial intelligence.

Steve Oliver recently completed his doctorate in science education from the University of Georgia. His expertise lies in the area of using computers in instruction.

Another new assistant professor in the college will be in charge of new student programs and recruitment, Byrne said.

Mike Dannels joins the faculty in counseling and student personnel services with an interest in recruitment and retention. Dannels received his doctorate from the University of Iowa.

Administration changes in the College of Education include Emmett Wright being named the new head of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction. Wright has been a member of the faculty since 1984.

Enrollment in evening classes increases

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

Although K-State has experienced a decline in enrollment, the number of credit hours taken by students in the After Hours program has increased significantly.

"We do not currently have a way of counting students who are enrolled in evening classes, but we can figure up how many credit hours are enrolled in the sections," said Peg Wherry, coordinator for After Hours, a program in the Division of Continuing Education.

During the spring semester, the program experienced a 12 percent increase over last fall.

The only difference between classes offered in the After Hours progam and other classes at K-State is the time they meet. Any class that is at 4:30 p.m. or later is considered an After Hours course. The most common starting times are 4:30 and 7 p.m.

"The reason for After Hours is to serve that population that cannot attend classes during the day," Wherry said. This does not mean, however, that students taking day classes cannot take a night class if needed, she said.

After Hours gives the student an opportunity to both work and go to school.

"It allows me to work full-time and yet have all but one night a week free," said Kirstin Fieldson, senior in social science. She said a greater number of students are enrolled in her class than the instructor had anticipated.

Between 150 and 170 sections are offered each semester, all of which are listed in the line schedule. They consist of both graduate and undergraduate level courses.

There are several graduate programs that are fairly well established, Wherry said. It is even possible to earn a graduate degree while only taking evening courses, she said.

The College of Education offers a variety of courses and also offers several degree programs. Two other areas, the College of Business Administration and the Department of Political Science are in the process of making master's degrees available for After Hours students.

"The spring of '85 was a real turning point," Wherry said. At that time, introductory-level courses including speech, sociology, psychology and algebra were added to the evening schedule so that students could work toward undergraduate degrees. She said now there are many more required courses available in the evening.

Also in the spring of '85, a mail-in enrollment procedure was implemented for undergraduate students who might have obligations during the day that make it impossible to enroll on campus. There is no separate enrollment procedure for students taking night classes or a combination of day and night classes. All students follow regular enrollment procedures.

The evening classes function on the same semester schedule as the daytime classes. Most meet one night a week for 2½ to 3 hours. However, some courses, such as math and composition, meet twice a week for 90 minutes.

Classes are in only a few buildings. This conserves energy and concentrates the student population so they are not scattered across campus, Wherry said. The same instructors teach both day and night sections.

Most students seeking an adviser can schedule an appointment with Wherry during the day. However, for those students needing an adviser in their own department, there is one person identified in each dean's office who will work with After Hours students, she said.

Promotion of K-State After Hours is directed mostly to the off-campus audience.

Food Service's outdoor grill to close due to few patrons

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Food Service's grill near Cardwell Hall will be closing for the last time today.

Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said the grill is closing because "the participation and sales just aren't there."

The grill has been open from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. to serve customers on the north side of campus.

Sisson said although the grill is well-received by its regular customers, there just are not enough of them.

The grill opened near the south entrance of Cardwell during the first week of July. Sisson said at that time, sales were successful enough to continue the grill after summer classes ended. Then sales decreased to a point where it was too expensive to operate the grill, she said, and it closed until the beginning of the fall semester.

Becky Lind, Union service dietitian and a supervisor at the grill, said it was time-consuming to load and deliver the equipment and supplies each day to take to the stand. Also, 40 hours a week of Union employees' time was spent on the grill, she said.

University to concentrate on worldwide recruitment

By The Collegian Staff

University recruitment efforts span the globe as the International Coordinating Council concentrates its efforts on increasing the number of foreign students.

K-State currently has more than 830 foreign students from 50 nations, said newly-elected ICC president, Seiichi Yoshino.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said she and Yoshino have been contacting foreign consulates and embassies as well as the Institute of International Education.

Other new officers include vice president Ingko Oetomo, senior in industrial engineering from Indonesia; treasurer Korosh Parizadeh, graduate in computer science from Iran; and secretary Kimio Tsuchiya, graduate in grain science from Japan.

ICC coordinates activities and allocates funds provided by the Student Governing Association for all national and international student organizations.

Leadership in science education dean's aim

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Faculty and administration in the College of Education are striving to make the college a national leader in science education, said Dean of Education David Byrne.

Change of 'State'

"Just last spring the Kansas Board of Regents approved the University's proposal for a center for the study of science education," Byrne said.

"The College of Education will play a major role in this, but the colleges of engineering, arts and sciences, agriculture and veterinary medicine will be involved, too," he said. "We (the college) can't be a national leader on our own. We're very enthusiastic about support from other colleges."

Byrne said the improvement efforts in science education will gain added support next year when Provost Owen Koeppe will begin helping with the program.

"Koeppe, who is a biochemist and taught biochemistry, will add substantial strength to the center for science education," Byrne said.

Two new assistant professors are also hoped to be a helpful addition to the science education program, Byrne said.

Angelo Collins recently completed her doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. Collins has a minor in human genetics and has worked in areas of problem solving using artificial intelligence.

Steve Oliver recently completed his doctorate in science education from the University of Georgia. His expertise lies in the area of using computers in instruction.

Another new assistant professor in the college will be in charge of new student programs and recruitment, Byrne said.

Mike Dannels joins the faculty in counseling and student personnel services with an interest in recruitment and retention. Dannels received his doctorate from the University of Iowa.

Administration changes in the College of Education include Emmett Wright being named the new head of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction. Wright has been a member of the faculty since 1984.

Enrollment in evening classes increases

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

Although K-State has experienced a decline in enrollment, the number of credit hours taken by students in the After Hours program has increased significantly.

"We do not currently have a way of counting students who are enrolled in evening classes, but we can figure up how many credit hours are enrolled in the sections," said Peg Wherry, coordinator for After Hours, a program in the Division of Continuing Education.

During the spring semester, the program experienced a 12 percent increase over last fall.

The only difference between classes offered in the After Hours progam and other classes at K-State is the time they meet. Any class that is at 4:30 p.m. or later is considered an After Hours course. The most common starting times are 4:30 and 7 p.m.

"The reason for After Hours is to serve that population that cannot attend classes during the day," Wherry said. This does not mean, however, that students taking day classes cannot take a night class if needed, she said.

After Hours gives the student an opportunity to both work and go to school.

"It allows me to work full-time and yet have all but one night a week free," said Kirstin Fieldson, senior in social science. She said a greater number of students are enrolled in her class than the instructor had anticipated.

Between 150 and 170 sections are offered each semester, all of which are listed in the line schedule. They consist of both graduate and undergraduate level courses.

There are several graduate programs that are fairly well established, Wherry said. It is even possible to earn a graduate degree while only taking evening courses, she said.

The College of Education offers a variety of courses and also offers several degree programs. Two other areas, the College of Business Administration and the Department of Political Science are in the process of making master's degrees available for After Hours students.

"The spring of '85 was a real turning point," Wherry said. At that time, introductory-level courses including speech, sociology, psychology and algebra were added to the evening schedule so that students could work toward undergraduate degrees. She said now there are many more required courses available in the evening.

Also in the spring of '85, a mail-in enrollment procedure was implemented for undergraduate students who might have obligations during the day that make it impossible to enroll on campus. There is no separate enrollment procedure for students taking night classes or a combination of day and night classes. All students follow regular enrollment procedures.

The evening classes function on the same semester schedule as the daytime classes. Most meet one night a week for 2½ to 3 hours. However, some courses, such as math and composition, meet twice a week for 90 minutes.

Classes are in only a few buildings. This conserves energy and concentrates the student population so they are not scattered across campus, Wherry said. The same instructors teach both day and night sections.

Most students seeking an adviser can schedule an appointment with Wherry during the day. However, for those students needing an adviser in their own department, there is one person identified in each dean's office who will work with After Hours students, she said.

Promotion of K-State After Hours is directed mostly to the off-campus audience.

Food Service's outdoor grill to close due to few patrons

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Food Service's grill near Cardwell Hall will be closing for the last time today.

Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said the grill is closing because "the participation and sales just aren't there."

The grill has been open from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. to serve customers on the north side of campus.

Sisson said although the grill is well-received by its regular customers, there just are not enough of them.

The grill opened near the south entrance of Cardwell during the first week of July. Sisson said at that time, sales were successful enough to continue the grill after summer classes ended. Then sales decreased to a point where it was too expensive to operate the grill, she said, and it closed until the beginning of the fall semester.

Becky Lind, Union service dietitian and a supervisor at the grill, said it was time-consuming to load and deliver the equipment and supplies each day to take to the stand. Also, 40 hours a week of Union employees' time was spent on the grill, she said.

University to concentrate on worldwide recruitment

By The Collegian Staff

University recruitment efforts span the globe as the International Coordinating Council concentrates its efforts on increasing the number of foreign students.

K-State currently has more than 830 foreign students from 50 nations, said newly-elected ICC president, Seiichi Yoshino.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said she and Yoshino have been contacting foreign consulates and embassies as well as the Institute of International Education.

Other new officers include vice president Ingko Oetomo, senior in industrial engineering from Indonesia; treasurer Korosh Parizadeh, graduate in computer science from Iran; and secretary Kimio Tsuchiya, graduate in grain science from Japan.

ICC coordinates activities and allocates funds provided by the Student Governing Association for all national and international student organizations.

On Our Cover

It's a surge of purple across a field of green. It's a beat. It's a chant. It's a rave. It's cheeks billowing against the mouthpiece of a horn. It's the huge bell of a tuba spreading the bass tones of "Wabash Cannonball" far into the stands. It's an explosion of sound — anchored to the ground by a group of students whose determination, sweat, spirit and practice, practice, practice make them The Pride of Wildcat Land — The K-State Marching Band.

Music Review

Peter Gabriel melds melody to all moods

By JILL HUMMELS
Contributing Writer

With a sound that's as solid as oak and a sandpaper voice, Peter Gabriel has fashioned his latest album, "So," into a work of art.

The album is this year's definitive rock LP and gives every listener something to identify with. Though it contains only eight songs, the collection offers incredible variety: something to dance to, something to relax to, something to think about and, because it's Gabriel, something to be puzzled by.

The songs were produced to perfection by Gabriel and Daniel Lanois. There is nothing extraneous to the tunes. They have all they need to produce a feeling of completeness. A superior blend of crisp highs, booming bass and harmonizing vocals is manifest in the songs.

The album opens up with "Red Rain;" a pleading song with a kind of disarming, dream-like symbolism. Gabriel's piano and the rolling drums of Jerry Marotta fill the song with a sense of urgency that should be present if the heavens really were dropping red rain.

Aside from this summer's smash hit, "Sledgehammer," Gabriel offers one other song that refuses to sit still. "Big Time" spins and jams as it personifies the human desire to make it big in every sense. "I'll be a big noise with all the big boys, so much stuff I will own. And I will pray to a big god as I kneel in the big church."

But "Big Time" comes after two slower, more calculated songs about the tough times in life: "Don't Give Up" and "Mercy Street." British singer Kate Bush completes the duet in "Don't Give Up." Her soft voice encourages the down-trodden figure to not give up on life.

Side Two starts with "In Your Eyes," a song of love and fulfillment. The song is made delicate with wonderful percussion, yet it exudes the power and depth of love some people feel.

"So" is the best rock album this year.

Leadership in science education dean's aim

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Faculty and administration in the College of Education are striving to make the college a national leader in science education, said Dean of Education David Byrne.

Change of 'State'

"Just last spring the Kansas Board of Regents approved the University's proposal for a center for the study of science education," Byrne said.

"The College of Education will play a major role in this, but the colleges of engineering, arts and sciences, agriculture and veterinary medicine will be involved, too," he said. "We (the college) can't be a national leader on our own. We're very enthusiastic about support from other colleges."

Byrne said the improvement efforts in science education will gain added support next year when Provost Owen Koeppe will begin helping with the program.

"Koeppe, who is a biochemist and taught biochemistry, will add substantial strength to the center for science education," Byrne said.

Two new assistant professors are also hoped to be a helpful addition to the science education program, Byrne said.

Angelo Collins recently completed her doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. Collins has a minor in human genetics and has worked in areas of problem solving using artificial intelligence.

Steve Oliver recently completed his doctorate in science education from the University of Georgia. His expertise lies in the area of using computers in instruction.

Another new assistant professor in the college will be in charge of new student programs and recruitment, Byrne said.

Mike Dannels joins the faculty in counseling and student personnel services with an interest in recruitment and retention. Dannels received his doctorate from the University of Iowa.

Administration changes in the College of Education include Emmett Wright being named the new head of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction. Wright has been a member of the faculty since 1984.

Enrollment in evening classes increases

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

Although K-State has experienced a decline in enrollment, the number of credit hours taken by students in the After Hours program has increased significantly.

"We do not currently have a way of counting students who are enrolled in evening classes, but we can figure up how many credit hours are enrolled in the sections," said Peg Wherry, coordinator for After Hours, a program in the Division of Continuing Education.

During the spring semester, the program experienced a 12 percent increase over last fall.

The only difference between classes offered in the After Hours progam and other classes at K-State is the time they meet. Any class that is at 4:30 p.m. or later is considered an After Hours course. The most common starting times are 4:30 and 7 p.m.

"The reason for After Hours is to serve that population that cannot attend classes during the day," Wherry said. This does not mean, however, that students taking day classes cannot take a night class if needed, she said.

After Hours gives the student an opportunity to both work and go to school.

"It allows me to work full-time and yet have all but one night a week free," said Kirstin Fieldson, senior in social science. She said a greater number of students are enrolled in her class than the instructor had anticipated.

Between 150 and 170 sections are offered each semester, all of which are listed in the line schedule. They consist of both graduate and undergraduate level courses.

There are several graduate programs that are fairly well established, Wherry said. It is even possible to earn a graduate degree while only taking evening courses, she said.

The College of Education offers a variety of courses and also offers several degree programs. Two other areas, the College of Business Administration and the Department of Political Science are in the process of making master's degrees available for After Hours students.

"The spring of '85 was a real turning point," Wherry said. At that time, introductory-level courses including speech, sociology, psychology and algebra were added to the evening schedule so that students could work toward undergraduate degrees. She said now there are many more required courses available in the evening.

Also in the spring of '85, a mail-in enrollment procedure was implemented for undergraduate students who might have obligations during the day that make it impossible to enroll on campus. There is no separate enrollment procedure for students taking night classes or a combination of day and night classes. All students follow regular enrollment procedures.

The evening classes function on the same semester schedule as the daytime classes. Most meet one night a week for 2½ to 3 hours. However, some courses, such as math and composition, meet twice a week for 90 minutes.

Classes are in only a few buildings. This conserves energy and concentrates the student population so they are not scattered across campus, Wherry said. The same instructors teach both day and night sections.

Most students seeking an adviser can schedule an appointment with Wherry during the day. However, for those students needing an adviser in their own department, there is one person identified in each dean's office who will work with After Hours students, she said.

Promotion of K-State After Hours is directed mostly to the off-campus audience.

Food Service's outdoor grill to close due to few patrons

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Food Service's grill near Cardwell Hall will be closing for the last time today.

Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said the grill is closing because "the participation and sales just aren't there."

The grill has been open from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. to serve customers on the north side of campus.

Sisson said although the grill is well-received by its regular customers, there just are not enough of them.

The grill opened near the south trance of Cardwell during the first week of July. Sisson said at that time, sales were successful enough to continue the grill after summer classes ended. Then sales decreased to a point where it was too expensive to operate the grill, she said, and it closed until the beginning of the fall semester.

Becky Lind, Union service dietitian and a supervisor at the grill, said it was time-consuming to load and deliver the equipment and supplies each day to take to the stand. Also, 40 hours a week of Union employees' time was spent on the

The K-State Marching Band:

Forever the Pride

Stan Flack — Band Director

"We are the band
And couldn't be prouder.
If you can't hear us,
We'll play a little louder.
We go on the field
In the middle of the game
To play a lot of songs
And get a little fame.
We are the K-State Marching Band
Playing every Saturday
In Wildcat land.
When we went to KU,
Some feathers we ruffled
Cause we're just here
Doing the Drum Line Shuffle."

The percussion's newest chant is just one small part of the enormous amount of spirit generated by the K-State Marching Band. The dedication, drive, determination and talent in each band member sets "The Pride of Wildcat Land" apart from other marching bands.

"Attitude and desire sets our band apart," said Stanley Finck, band director. "They are doing something that they believe in. They are normal band members who have this attitude that is really going for them."

The polished performances viewed by thousands of K-State fans during the fall football season gels the many hours of practice required and the many after-hours spent together.

"We have grown together as a band (over the past four years)," said Kim Letellier, senior in music education. "We play as a tighter group. Part of the reason for sticking together is the members do a lot of things away from the band."

Getting about 200 people to march, play and perform as a synchronized unit requires individual commitment. They march through rain, snow, heat and other weather conditions that usually drive all but the most dedicated fans indoors.

"You learn to cope with weather. You put your mind into the music. That helps," said John Bodine, senior in pre-medicine. "You think about the service for the team and the school and the fans. It's a challenge. It's a test. When it rains, the woodwinds have to put their instruments away but the brass and percussion keep on jammin'."

It doesn't take long for freshmen just entering the program to catch the excitement and commitment. It is all around them.

"I liked the positive attitude they promoted," said Paul Siegfried, freshman in business administration. "They were relaxed toward the new people. They promote doing the best you can possibly do."

"The seniors work hard to keep spirits up. They are really excited constantly," Letellier said. "Freshmen and underclassmen are always looking up to the seniors. Everyone works to keep up the spirit."

Spirit comes in many strange packages. The trumpet section stays behind after the pep band has made its way around the football stadium and plays to just the field house because, "It's just something we do," said Tim Baggerly, senior in music education.

Thinking up new ways to hype the band falls much of the time on the shoulders of the drum majors, and they never fail to come up with something creative.

"Last year we (Jodie Johnson and Compton) took a king size sheet and made a poster out of it that said 'Blast KU'," said Julie Compton, fifth-year drum major and senior in industrial engineering. "We drove to Lawrence during the middle of the night and put the sheet over the billboard just before entering Lawrence. The next day we told everyone to be looking for it and when we drove over the hill, well, there was just a lot of excitement on the bus."

The fall season begins with Howdy Week, held the week before school starts. During the week, everyone becomes reacquainted or, in the case of transferring students and freshmen, are introduced for the first time. Each day there is a special planned activity. One day, everyone wears their high school colors. On another day, everyone wears Hawaiian attire in preparation for an evening luau held on the loading dock at McCain Auditorium.

"Everyone is invited to the party. We made sure everyone danced with everyone else," Compton said. "It helped break the ice."

Although new drills and formations are constantly being written and reworked, the traditions are always there even though they might have been buried in a closet somewhere.

"We have this tradition we haven't used for three years because we haven't won a home game and at the KU-K-State game everyone ran onto

Also in the spring of '85, a mail-in enrollment procedure was implemented for undergraduate students who might have obligations during the day that make it impossible to enroll on campus. There is no separate enrollment procedure for students taking night classes or a combination of day and night classes. All students follow regular enrollment procedures.

The evening classes function on the same semester schedule as the daytime classes. Most meet one night a week for 2½ to 3 hours. However, some courses, such as math and composition, meet twice a week for 90 minutes.

Classes are in only a few buildings. This conserves energy and concentrates the student population so they are not scattered across campus, Wherry said. The same instructors teach both day and night sections.

Most students seeking an adviser can schedule an appointment with Wherry during the day. However, for those students needing an adviser in their own department, there is one person identified in each dean's office who will work with After Hours students, she said.

Promotion of K-State After Hours is directed mostly to the off-campus audience.

Food Service's outdoor grill to close due to few patrons

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Food Service's grill near Cardwell Hall will be closing for the last time today.

Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said the grill is closing because "the participation and sales just aren't there."

The grill has been open from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. to serve customers on the north side of campus.

Sisson said although the grill is well-received by its regular customers, there just are not enough of them.

The grill opened near the south entrance of Cardwell during the first week of July. Sisson said at that time, sales were successful enough to continue the grill after summer classes ended. Then sales decreased to a point where it was too expensive to operate the grill, she said, and it closed until the beginning of the fall semester.

Becky Lind, Union service dietitian and a supervisor at the grill, said it was time-consuming to load and deliver the equipment and supplies each day to take to the stand. Also, 40 hours a week of Union employees' time was spent on the grill, she said.

University to concentrate on worldwide recruitment

By The Collegian Staff

University recruitment efforts span the globe as the International Coordinating Council concentrates its efforts on increasing the number of foreign students.

K-State currently has more than 830 foreign students from 50 nations, said newly-elected ICC president, Seiichi Yoshino.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said she and Yoshino have been contacting foreign consulates and embassies as well as the Institute of International Education.

Other new officers include vice president Ingko Oetomo, senior in industrial engineering from Indonesia; treasurer Korosh Parizadeh, graduate in computer science from Iran; and secretary Kimio Tsuchiya, graduate in grain science from Japan.

ICC coordinates activities and allocates funds provided by the Student Governing Association for all national and international student organizations.

the field. We always play a post-game show (at a home game) whether we win or lose. There might be tears running down my face from losing by 2 points to KU or whatever, but we're always out there," Baggerly said. "If the 'Cats win, the drum majors will take off their hats, hold them high above their heads and slowly turn them around and put them on their heads backward. With that signal, the whole band takes off their hats and wears them backward for the rest of the show. We play 'the Wabash' and everyone just goes crazy. The tubas circle the field and it really gets out of hand."

Four years ago, the tradition of having the band run onto the field for the pre-game show was revived. Everyone remembers what it was like the first time they ran out to perform. That feeling of excitement returns every time the show begins.

"The first time I ran onto the field, I couldn't believe all the people. I felt kinda small out on the field," Bodine said. "I felt pretty important being part of the band. I was in the spotlight. You get that natural high every time."

Many of the best memories band members reflect on are connected with KU-K-State games from the past couple of years.

"I've got a story to tell you," Baggerly said. "Scott Freebie played the trumpet solo at the KU-K-State game two years ago. I mean this cat could part your hair 50 rows up in the alumni section. The trumpets formed a V around him. There was a real slow beginning and we turned the show to the students.

"When we (the trumpets) came in on the first note, we took so much air in and blew so hard, there was a decrease in oxygen in Manhattan for a second or two. The students just stood up screaming and hollering. I've never seen a crowd reaction like that before or since," he said.

The satisfaction of hearing the crowd roar with appreciation makes the hard work, sweat and dedication pay off. But giving the best performance possible makes it even better.

"There is one performance that sticks out in my mind," Bodine said. "Last year we went to the KU game and the percussion section did a feature piece (without any other instuments) for the KU band. It's a tradition when you go to an

Leadership in science education dean's aim

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Faculty and administration in the College of Education are striving to make the college a national leader in science education, said Dean of Education David Byrne.

Change of 'State'

"Just last spring the Kansas Board of Regents approved the University's proposal for a center for the study of science education," Byrne said.

"The College of Education will play a major role in this, but the colleges of engineering, arts and sciences, agriculture and veterinary medicine will be involved, too," he said. "We (the college) can't be a national leader on our own. We're very enthusiastic about support from other colleges."

Byrne said the improvement efforts in science education will gain added support next year when Provost Owen Koeppe will begin helping with the program.

"Koeppe, who is a biochemist and taught biochemistry, will add substantial strength to the center for science education," Byrne said.

Two new assistant professors are also hoped to be a helpful addition to the science education program, Byrne said.

Angelo Collins recently completed her doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. Collins has a minor in human genetics and has worked in areas of problem solving using artificial intelligence.

Steve Oliver recently completed his doctorate in science education from the University of Georgia. His expertise lies in the area of using computers in instruction.

Another new assistant professor in the college will be in charge of new student programs and recruitment, Byrne said.

Mike Dannels joins the faculty in counseling and student personnel services with an interest in recruitment and retention. Dannels received his doctorate from the University of Iowa.

Administration changes in the College of Education include Emmett Wright being named the new head of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction. Wright has been a member of the faculty since 1984.

Enrollment in evening classes increases

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

Although K-State has experienced a decline in enrollment, the number of credit hours taken by students in the After Hours program has increased significantly.

"We do not currently have a way of counting students who are enrolled in evening classes, but we can figure up how many credit hours are enrolled in the sections," said Peg Wherry, coordinator for After Hours, a program in the Division of Continuing Education.

During the spring semester, the program experienced a 12 percent increase over last fall.

The only difference between classes offered in the After Hours progam and other classes at K-State is the time they meet. Any class that is at 4:30 p.m. or later is considered an After Hours course. The most common starting times are 4:30 and 7 p.m.

"The reason for After Hours is to serve that population that cannot attend classes during the day," Wherry said. This does not mean, however, that students taking day classes cannot take a night class if needed, she said.

After Hours gives the student an opportunity to both work and go to school.

"It allows me to work full-time and yet have all but one night a week free," said Kirstin Fieldson, senior in social science. She said a greater number of students are enrolled in her class than the instructor had anticipated.

Between 150 and 170 sections are offered each semester, all of which are listed in the line schedule. They consist of both graduate and undergraduate level courses.

There are several graduate programs that are fairly well established, Wherry said. It is even possible to earn a graduate degree while only taking evening courses, she said.

The College of Education offers a variety of courses and also offers several degree programs. Two other areas, the College of Business Administration and the Department of Political Science are in the process of making master's degrees available for After Hours students.

"The spring of '85 was a real turning point," Wherry said. At that time, introductory-level courses including speech, sociology, psychology and algebra were added to the evening schedule so that students could work toward undergraduate degrees. She said now there are many more required courses available in the evening.

Also in the spring of '85, a mail-in enrollment procedure was implemented for undergraduate students who might have obligations during the day that make it impossible to enroll on campus. There is no separate enrollment procedure for students taking night classes or a combination of day and night classes. All students follow regular enrollment procedures.

The evening classes function on the same semester schedule as the daytime classes. Most meet one night a week for 2½ to 3 hours. However, some courses, such as math and composition, meet twice a week for 90 minutes.

Classes are in only a few buildings. This conserves energy and concentrates the student population so they are not scattered across campus, Wherry said. The same instructors teach both day and night sections.

Most students seeking an adviser can schedule an appointment with Wherry during the day. However, for those students needing an adviser in their own department, there is one person identified in each dean's office who will work with After Hours students, she said.

"Well, the KU line didn't have an answer. It's like we showed them up or something," he said.

The students attribute much of their success to their motivator, friend, director and inspiration, Stanley Finck. His constant guidance gives the band the positive attitude which is so vital to a successful program.

"He can be in front of us and be beside us. He is a very quiet man. If he wants your attention, he speaks in a normal voice, unless, of course, he has the megaphone. He is a silent motivator. If he has a new idea and we do it right he says, 'That made my heart go pitty-pat,'" Baggerly said.

When the uniforms have been stored away, and the instuments are locked into their cases, only the memories will remain. The friendships will endure the longest.

"The people you meet are the best," said Kimberly Walker, senior in music education. "By the time spring roles around, you forget all the bad and just have good memories left."

Leadership in science education dean's aim

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Faculty and administration in the College of Education are striving to make the college a national leader in science education, said Dean of Education David Byrne.

Change of 'State'

"Just last spring the Kansas Board of Regents approved the University's proposal for a center for the study of science education," Byrne said.

"The College of Education will play a major role in this, but the colleges of engineering, arts and sciences, agriculture and veterinary medicine will be involved, too," he said. "We (the college) can't be a national leader on our own. We're very enthusiastic about support from other colleges."

Byrne said the improvement efforts in science education will gain added support next year when Provost Owen Koeppe will begin helping with the program.

"Koeppe, who is a biochemist and taught biochemistry, will add substantial strength to the center for science education," Byrne said.

Two new assistant professors are also hoped to be a helpful addition to the science education program, Byrne said.

Angelo Collins recently completed her doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. Collins has a minor in human genetics and has worked in areas of problem solving using artificial intelligence.

Steve Oliver recently completed his doctorate in science education from the University of Georgia. His expertise lies in the area of using computers in instruction.

Another new assistant professor in the college will be in charge of new student programs and recruitment, Byrne said.

Mike Dannels joins the faculty in counseling and student personnel services with an interest in recruitment and retention. Dannels received his doctorate from the University of Iowa.

Administration changes in the College of Education include Emmett Wright being named the new head of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction. Wright has been a member of the faculty since 1984.

Enrollment in evening classes increases

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

Although K-State has experienced a decline in enrollment, the number of credit hours taken by students in the After Hours program has increased significantly.

"We do not currently have a way of counting students who are enrolled in evening classes, but we can figure up how many credit hours are enrolled in the sections," said Peg Wherry, coordinator for After Hours, a program in the Division of Continuing Education.

During the spring semester, the program experienced a 12 percent increase over last fall.

The only difference between classes offered in the After Hours progam and other classes at K-State is the time they meet. Any class that is at 4:30 p.m. or later is considered an After Hours course. The most common starting times are 4:30 and 7 p.m.

"The reason for After Hours is to serve that population that cannot attend classes during the day," Wherry said. This does not mean, however, that students taking day classes cannot take a night class if needed, she said.

After Hours gives the student an opportunity to both work and go to school.

"It allows me to work full-time and yet have all but one night a week free," said Kirstin Fieldson, senior in social science. She said a greater number of students are enrolled in her class than the instructor had anticipated.

Between 150 and 170 sections are offered each semester, all of which are listed in the line schedule. They consist of both graduate and undergraduate level courses.

There are several graduate programs that are fairly well established, Wherry said. It is even possible to earn a graduate degree while only taking evening courses, she said.

The College of Education offers a variety of courses and also offers several degree programs. Two other areas, the College of Business Administration and the Department of Political Science are in the process of making master's degrees available for After Hours students.

"The spring of '85 was a real turning point," Wherry said. At that time, introductory-level courses including speech, sociology, psychology and algebra were added to the evening schedule so that students could work toward undergraduate degrees. She said now there are many more required courses available in the evening.

Also in the spring of '85, a mail-in enrollment procedure was implemented for undergraduate students who might have obligations during the day that make it impossible to enroll on campus. There is no separate enrollment procedure for students taking night classes or a combination of day and night classes. All students follow regular enrollment procedures.

The evening classes function on the same semester schedule as the daytime classes. Most meet one night a week for 2½ to 3 hours. However, some courses, such as math and composition, meet twice a week for 90 minutes.

Classes are in only a few buildings. This conserves energy and concentrates the student population so they are not scattered across campus, Wherry said. The same instructors teach both day and night sections.

Most students seeking an adviser can schedule an appointment with Wherry during the day. However, for those students needing an adviser in their own department, there is one person identified in each dean's office who will work with After Hours students, she said.

Promotion of K-State After Hours is directed mostly to the off-campus audience.

Food Service's outdoor grill to close due to few patrons

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Food Service's grill near Cardwell Hall will be closing for the last time today.

Malley Sisson, Union food service director, said the grill is closing because "the participation and sales just aren't there."

The grill has been open from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. to serve customers on the north side of campus.

Sisson said although the grill is well-received by its regular customers, there just are not enough of them.

The grill opened near the south entrance of Cardwell during the first week of July. Sisson said at that time, sales were successful enough to continue the grill after summer classes ended. Then sales decreased to a point where it was too expensive to operate the grill, she said, and it closed until the beginning of the fall semester.

Becky Lind, Union service dietitian and a supervisor at the grill, said it was time-consuming to load and deliver the equipment and supplies each day to take to the stand. Also, 40 hours a week of Union employees' time was spent on the grill, she said.

University to concentrate on worldwide recruitment

By The Collegian Staff

University recruitment efforts span the globe as the International Coordinating Council concentrates its efforts on increasing the number of foreign students.

K-State currently has more than 830 foreign students from 50 nations, said newly-elected ICC president, Seiichi Yoshino.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said she and Yoshino have been contacting foreign consulates and embassies as well as the Institute of International Education.

Other new officers include vice president Ingko Oetomo, senior in industrial engineering from Indonesia; treasurer Korosh Parizadeh, graduate in computer science from Iran; and secretary Kimio Tsuchiya, graduate in grain science from Japan.

ICC coordinates activities and allocates funds provided by the Student Governing Association for all national and international student organizations.

Month in D.C. readies student leaders

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

After a month in Washington, D.C., Student Body President Steven Johnson and his chief of staff returned to the University to work on improving communication, something they found lacking in the federal government.

Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, and Mike Kadel, chief of staff and senior in agricultural economics, worked this summer as interns for Kansas senators.

Both said the experience gave them new insight into government procedures, and they came back to the University ready to work with a new administration.

"It's important to keep the foot in the door (with the administration)," Johnson said. "All the projects have to go through the administration, and we've got to keep the communication lines open to prove we are reliable."

"Everyone is very interested in what they are doing and that carries across Washington," Kadel said. "There is a communication problem. People tend to shut out what isn't in their field. That could be either good or bad."

Johnson was an intern for Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan., from July 14 to Aug. 8. His duties varied from listening on the phone to voters' concerns to researching legal questions. Because Dole is on the Senate Agriculture Committee, much of Johnson's time was spent in the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

"I did a lot of calling to farmers back in the state asking their advice and opinions," he said. "I listened to what they had to say.

"I also talked a lot about the Senate Export Enhancement Program sponsored by Dole, which says the government will subsidize the grain sold to bring the price of our grain down to compete with the world market, namely Argentina and Australia."

Kadel had an internship with Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., from July 7 to Aug. 15. It involved many of the same duties as Johnson's, but Kadel was given the opportunity to fill in for the staff person with whom he worked.

"We were each assigned to a staff person," Kadel said. "I reported to Alan Ott. He was gone for two weeks of the four weeks I was there, so I had to fill in for him.

Kadel said he also took phone calls and explained the Conservation Reserve Program to people.

"That program allows acres to be set aside and the farmers to be subsidized by the USDA," he said. "I also took calls about the Drought Relief Program. Farmers would call in wanting to donate hay, and they wouldn't know where to send it or how to get in touch with the right people."

Both students agreed the experience gave them a better understanding of how the U.S. government works. Being involved with student government prepared them for the system, but the pace was faster than the Midwest, Johnson said.

"Our government systems are all basically the same, and different groups are pretty much patterned after the federal government," he said. "The pace and intensity was very stressful, and there was nothing to relieve the stress.

"I'm very glad I did it, but there were a lot of pressures and constant deadlines and so much red tape to get through."

Returning to K-State, Johnson and Kadel found they had a great deal of paperwork waiting for them.

"I had to catch up with the SAC (Student Advisory Committee to the Board of Regents) organization," Johnson said. "The (student body) president at KU kept me informed while I was gone."

Student Senate and Johnson and his cabinet are working on student issues and adapting to the restructuring of the new administration.

Johnson said some of the issues facing the committees this fall are campus parking problems, the freshmen orientation program and recruitment and retention. Steps have been taken in each area but there are many angles to each problem.

Million dollar grant aids computer links

By STEVEN ZADINA
Collegian Reporter

K-State was recently chosen to be part of a group of eight Midwestern universities sharing a $1 million grant from the National Science Foundation for the establishment of a regional computer network.

The regional network, called MIDnet, will make it possible for each of the universities to access National Supercomputing Centers and also link the universities' computer networks to each other.

"The MIDnet arrangement will allow us access to the most sophisticated computers available," said Robert Kruh, assistant provost and dean of the Graduate School.

"At a relatively low cost, it makes a service accessible that would be extremely expensive for any one university to own and maintain," he said.

The system will be used mainly as a research tool, solving problems that require massive speed or storage capabilities.

Anyone should be able to request access to the network through Tom Gallagher, director of computing activities, and should be able to access the system from any terminal on campus linked to the mainframe system, Kruh said.

The system will not be ready for almost a year, however, because of the installation of special phone lines and computer links, Gallagher said.

Gallagher said the schools that are connected to the MIDnet system will have access to supercomputer centers at the University of Illinois in Urbana-Champaign and the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo.

'Husker decision may change rules

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Assistant Athletic Director Lee Moon said Thursday that he believes the NCAA ruling in favor of Nebraska in the controversy over Cornhusker football players selling complimentary tickets will prompt a future change in the policy.

The NCAA Subcommittee of Eligibility Wednesday restored the eligibility of 60 Nebraska players who had been suspended for as many as two games for misuse of complimentary game passes last season.

"It's nearly impossible to enforce it to the letter of the law," said Moon, who oversees the procedure for K-State. "If you're not going to do it, you've got to re-evaluate the rule and what you're trying to do with it. I think that's what's going to happen in the near future. The NCAA Council will review it in December."

The policy, followed by schools nationwide, involves players filling out a card in the weeks before games and naming two to four people (depending on the player) to receive the complimentary passes.

For football games, K-State gives the top 60 varsity players four passes to give to family and student-friends with the remainder of players receiving two passes for the same purpose.

The person receiving complimentary tickets must be either a member of the player's immediate family (mother, father, sister, brother) or a student at a four-year college. A player's fiancee, cousin or aunt, for example, would not be eligible to receive the passes.

"I can't catch everything, but I survey it," Moon said. "The thing you look for is something out of the norm, like a person listed as a student one week and a brother the next."

In order to prevent the complimentary ticket holders from selling the tickets, athletic department officials require those receiving the tickets to sign a form at the pass gate and the tickets are ripped in half immediately.

The problem comes when the athletes are dishonest about the identities of those receiving passes, as in the violation that occurred at Nebraska.

"What you've got to depend on is the integrity of the student-athlete not to give you bogus names and not to try to circumvent the rule," Moon said. "It's a service you give to the kids to give their families the opportunity to come to games to see them play. You would hope they would not abuse the privilege."

Wildcats host tourney with 2 starters injured

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

The K-State volleyball squad will attempt to defend its title in the 10th-annual Kansas State Invitational this weekend at Ahearn Field House.

The 'Cats, who are coming off a second-place finish in last weekend's KSU/Pepsi Invitational, will face Wichita State, Kansas and Drake University in the round-robin tournament.

"This tournament really has added significance," Coach Scott Nelson said, "because one of our goals is to be highly successful against our in-state rivals."

K-State opens the tournament with a 3 p.m. match against Drake on Friday, and then comes back to play Kansas at 7:30 that evening. The 'Cats will finish the tournament with a 3 p.m. match Saturday against Wichita State.

"We'll have to play extremely well to repeat as champions," Nelson said. "I think we are competitive with all the teams in the tournament, and if we play well, we should be in a good position to win."

K-State will have to do so, however, without the services of two of its top three players. Team captain Mary Kinsey was diagnosed Tuesday as having a stress fracture of the left foot and will be out four to six weeks. Senior Helen Bundy is still recovering from ligament damage in her knee, but should be back soon, Nelson said.

"We're still good without them, but I think we're better when they are healthy and we have them participating," Nelson said. "Whenever you replace experience, you do replace some leadership, because people that have been around tend to be the ones that are the calmest under pressure and different things like that."

Nelson, however, remains optimistic about his team's chances even without those two. He pointed to the Missouri game last weekend, which his squad won without the services of Kinsey or Bundy, as evidence.

The 'Cats should face their stiffest competition in the tournament from the Jayhawks of Kansas, who are 1-0 on the year. Nelson said they return basically the same team that knocked K-State out of the national volleyball tournament in Wichita last spring.

"Kansas is a team that we've traditionally beaten over the last several years," Nelson said. "But they hired a new coach (Frankie Albitz) last year and she has turned that program into a competetive one in just a year."

"Unlike the last few years, I think they're confident they can win. When you have two teams that are confident entering a match, it provides for a real exciting, suspenseful sort of match," he said.

Unlike the Jayhawks, both the Wichita State and Drake squads are somewhat young and inexperienced.

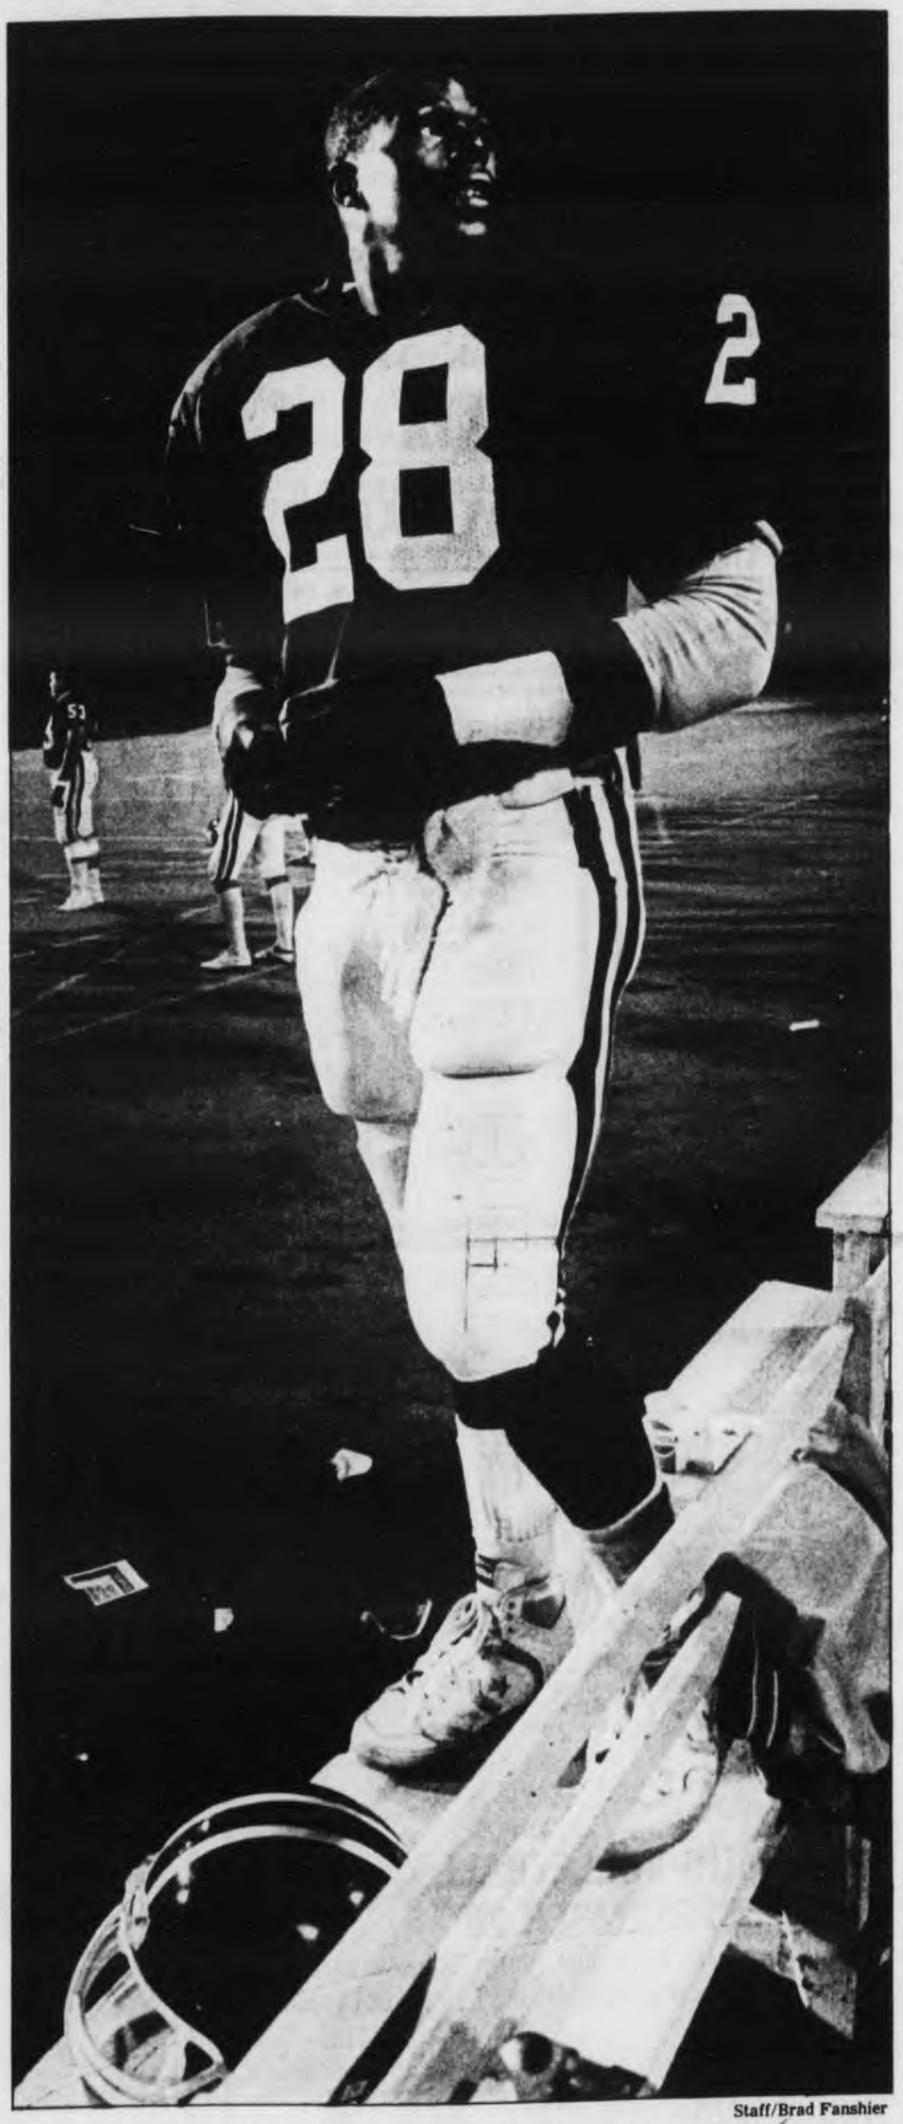
Drake comes off an 0-28 season last year, but has already won two of its first four matches this season. Wichita State is 0-2 on the year, but Nelson refuses to take the team lightly.

"Wichita State is a team that has been improving steadily over the last several years, much like we had done in previous years," he said. "They've improved their record and become more competitive. They're a team that is fundamentally fairly sound. They're kind of a dangerous team, too."

Nelson is pleased with the way his team has been playing in practice and believes that effort will be reflected during competition.

"We're highly competitive in practice, which is good," he said. "Our team is a fairly close-knit team, so it's competitive but yet it's supportive. I think one of the things that personifies our team is that we have a tremendous amount of effort and intensity. We have a good intensity level in practice, and we are very supportive of each other. I think that it's a real healthy learning environment, especially for our younger players."

In other matches during the tournament, Drake plays Wichita State at 5 p.m. Friday, Kansas meets Wichita State at 10 a.m. Saturday, and Drake squares off against Kansas after that at 12:30 p.m.



Admission to all games during the tournament is free.

K-State prepares to exact revenge on nationally ranked UNI squad

TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Only two weeks have gone by since K-State opened its 1986 football season against Western Illinois, but already Coach Stan Parrish's Wildcats find themselves in a position similar to the one they faced in the season opener.

Just as in the opener, the Wildcats will be facing a NCAA Division IAA foe Saturday at KSU Stadium. This week's opponent is Northern Iowa, a team that defeated K-State 10-6 last year. And, just as they did against Western Illinois, the 'Cats find themselves in a near must-win situation in their effort to gain credibility with students and fans.

Staff/Brad Fanshier

K-State starting fullback Maurice Henry suffered a foot injury in Tuesday's practice and will not be playing for at least three weeks. Henry, tested as the best overall conditioned athlete on the football team, will be replaced in the lineup by Ray Wilson.

"We have to be at the same emotional level we were in our opener," Parrish said. "There's no question that this game takes on the same type of importance in my mind that our opening game did. We have to answer that challenge."

After last week's 41-7 loss to Texas Tech at Lubbock, Parrish faces the burden of bringing his team back from a crushing defeat.

"We've only played two games. We can't have any guys looking down at the pavement," Parrish said. "We've got to have a positive attitude and we've got to make a resolution that we don't like what happened last Saturday."

In Northern Iowa, a IAA national semifinalist last year, K-State faces a team that was projected to be weaker than Texas Tech, but decidedly stronger than Western Illinois. The Panthers, ranked No. 3 in pre-season IAA polls, were stunned by Mankato State (Minn.) in a 16-16 tie last week.

"In the game here last year, I thought they were excellent. In the (Mankato State) game they played Saturday, I thought they were far from excellent, but I think they were looking toward us," Parrish said. "They were sleepwalking against Mankato. They'll come in here like it's the Super Bowl. They are going to come in here ready to go. We know that."

Northern Iowa Coach Darrell Mudra called the Mankato State game a disappointment, but said the Panthers opened even worse last year in a loss to Drake before coming back to beat K-State and win 11 consecutive games. Nonetheless, the opening tie has tempered Mudra's optimism about this season somewhat.

"We thought going in that we were going to be as good as last year, but obviously we aren't as good," Mudra said. "We obviously didn't prepare as well as (Mankato State) did. They prepared really good; we didn't."

Mudra is impressed with the strides K-State has made in Parrish's first year as coach.

"I think they improved a lot over a year ago," Mudra said. "They seem to be playing with more enthusiasm and they have pretty good personnel. (Quarterback Randy) Williams has improved a lot and (wide receiver Dan) Hughes has helped them a lot, too."

Northern Iowa runs an offense closely balanced between running and passing. Defensively, Parrish said he expects the Panthers to apply plenty of pressure and blitz frequently.

Among the Panthers to watch on offense are quarterback Mike Smith, who passed for 2,894 yards and 18 touchdowns last year. Running backs Carl Boyd (1,258 yards rushing in 1985) and Errol Peebles (996) even out the attack.

Defensively for Northern Iowa, senior inside linebackers Bob Storbeck and Mark Farley both return. Mudra calls the linebacking corps "the strength of the team."

GAME NOTES: Game time is 7 p.m....A big Band Day crowd is expected at KSU Stadium. High school bands from all over the state will nearly fill the end zone stands....The game will be broadcast locally on KMKF-FM (101.7) and WIBW-AM (580)...K-State starting fullback Maurice Henry suffered a foot injury in Tuesday's practice and will be out for at least three weeks. Henry will be replaced in the lineup by Ray Wilson. Tony Jordan will start at tailback. Todd Moody, the starter at tailback the first two games, will see action at both fullback and tailback.

Mets ready to break open bubbly in Philly

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The champagne is going with them on the short trip down the New Jersey Turnpike, along with the old joke about spending a weekend in Philadelphia one day.

The New York Mets, one victory from clinching their first division pennant in 13 years, say they can't wait to get to Philadelphia and celebrate.

"That crew out there knows how to party," Mets Manager Dave Johnson said.

Philadelphia, which fell to 22 games out of first and helped the Mets reduce their magic number to two by losing a three-game series against the Chicago Cubs, hosts New York for a three-game-series beginning Friday night in what could formally finalize the National League East race.

"We smell the end," said first baseman Keith Hernandez. "Right now, we're just looking to get it over with as quickly as possible."

The Mets missed their chance to wrap up the division at home when they dropped the first two games of a three-game series to Montreal this week.

"It will be nice to clinch in Philadelphia," Johnson said. "It gives us a chance to beat the only team in our way. This way, we won't back in. It's exciting. I have a nice warm feeling about this."

New York ace Dwight Gooden, 14-5, will oppose rookie left-hander Bruce Ruffin, 7-3 in the series opener. Although the Mets are 4-2 against the Phillies in Philadelphia (7-5 overall this season), the Phillies are 12-3 when the 22-year-old Ruffin pitches and Ruffin has beaten the Mets in his only outing against them, an 8-4 victory on Aug. 13.

"It'll be awesome," said Gooden. "All my life, I dreamed of pitching the clincher. I'm glad the way this came out, falling right into my hands."

Even if the Mets don't clinch Friday, they will have two more shots with Bob Ojeda, 16-5, against rookie Mike Maddux, 2-6, on Saturday and Sid Fernandez, 15-4, going on Sunday against Kevin Gross, 9-11.

"All we have to do is win one game in Philly," Hernandez said. "I don't think they'll sweep us, but if they do, winning it in St. Louis wouldn't be bad."

Parrish calls in police to help rally students

By The Collegian Staff

No, K-State football coach Stan Parrish isn't in trouble with the law.

Despite being in good standing with the men in blue, Parrish will be riding around town tonight inside a vehicle driven by an officer from the Riley County Police Department.

Before the season started, Parrish vowed he would do whatever it took to get the students out to the football games and he is holding true to the promise.

At 7 tonight, Parrish will travel around campus and the surrounding area to remind the student body that his Wildcats and the Northern Iowa Panthers will clash Saturday night at KSU Stadium.

Parrish will broadcast over the car's bullhorn in an attempt to rally the students in support of his football team which is 1-1 on the season.

Kenny Mossman, administrative assistant to the athletic department, said Parrish wants the students out in full force for the 7 p.m. game. Mossman said Parrish is hoping for a pep rally effect on the students.

Pats leave troubles behind, beat Jets

By The Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — All the worries about postseason problems on the New England Patriots have long been forgotten, according to the AFC champion's best player and coach.

The Patriots, losers in the Super Bowl to Chicago after three road victories in last year's playoffs, went through a tough period following the loss to the Bears. A newspaper story revealed that six Patriots were drug users and many of the players blamed Coach Raymond Berry for the revelation. All-Pro cornerback Raymond Clayborn demanded to be traded.

"That stuff is no problem," All-Pro linebacker Andre Tippett said prior to Thursday night's meeting with the New York Jets, whom the Patriots beat 26-14 in the AFC wild card playoff game last December. "We look at it as something that happened and we've bounced back and not worried about the controversy."

The Patriots came to Giants Stadium Thursday night and drubbed the Jets 20-6 after opening the season with a 33-3 rout of Indianapolis. The defense, led by Tippett and Don Blackmon, the other outside linebacker, held the Colts to only 83 yards rushing and recorded six sacks. The offense, behind the 18-for-29 passing of Tony Eason, Stanley Morgan's seven receptions for 116 yards and Stephen Starring's five for 102 yards, piled up 373 yards.

"It was a very impressive start," said Jets Coach Joe Walton.

Not that the Jets stumbled too much in their opener. They headed into the key AFC East matchup with the Patriots after a 28-24 win at Buffalo as quarterback Jim Kelly made his NFL debut.

Thursday night, Tony Collins caught two touchdown passes, one on an option pass from fellow running back Craig James, to help the Patriots win in the early-season showdown.

The win raised the Pats to 2-0 on the season. The Jets are now 1-1.

Students learn about ag professions at fair

By The Collegian Staff

For many students not yet in their senior year, the thought of what to do after graduation has not been a significant one.

But the Agribusiness Careers Fair may provide an opportunity for K-State students to become acquainted with agriculture-related businesses, said John B. Riley, assistant director of resident instruction for the College of Agriculture.

The Agribusiness Careers Fair, being conducted for the seventh year, is scheduled for 8:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Ballroom. The theme this year is "Shake Hands with Your Future," and the fair is open to all students.

About 26 businesses are scheduled to set up booths displaying literature and to have representatives present to talk with students. Riley said this will give the students an opportunity to learn specifics about the companies and what each company has to offer students.

Many of the representatives will be former K-State graduates who now work for one of the businesses. Not only is the fair a good opportunity for graduating K-State students, it is also an excellent chance for many underclassmen to look into internships with these companies, Riley said.

A number of these visiting businesses have returned each year because they believe in the University and the quality students it produces, Riley said. A few of the scheduled participants this year are Cargill, Ciba-Geigy Corp. and Kraft Foods, Inc.

Evening class offers supervisor training

Cites practical experiences, situations

By The Associated Press

Supervisors need supervisory skills just as technicians need tools to complete their jobs. These supervisory skills are being taught Thursday evenings in the new Training and Supervision course.

"It's almost sinful to promote someone to a supervisory position, give them the management hands and then hope they will succeed," said Darrell Brensing, vice president of education for the American Institute of Baking and instructor for the course.

Training and Supervision is a semester-long class covering leadership styles, motivation of employees, the art of delegation and time management.

The course is designed to help area businesses train the employees they have just promoted, or those they are going to promote into management positions.

Brensing said too often people are promoted who haven't been trained on how to manage people.

"I know of countless individuals that failed, not because they didn't know their jobs, but because they didn't know how to manage people," he said.

Brensing said the course is designed to give people skills so they can fulfill their particular jobs correctly.

"It's an undergraduate or graduate course designed for those people who will need supervisory skills and want to concentrate on them," he said.

The course will involve role playing and class discussions. Brensing said the course doesn't cover theoretical material. Instead, it covers practical experiences.

"The course covers things that I haven't read in a textbook; it's things I've done, practiced and utilized in 30 years of practical experience," Brensing said.

"Too often we ignore the companies in our area that need help in training their employees," he said. "In the Manhattan community and surrounding areas, this is a golden opportunity for the people to look to their University. Because as long as there are supervisors, there will be a need for the course," Brensing said.

he said had no complaints about the scholarship concept.

"The scholarships will be good for K-State, and having extra students will be good for Manhattan," he said.

Darling referred to a the Greater Manhattan Scholarship Program which has been organized by a group of local businesses to provide 1,000 scholarships of $1,000 each to University students during the next three years.

Jarvin Emerson, head of the Department of Economics, agreed with Darling.

"I've done a lot of work with community and regional multipliers, and that number is substantially too high," he said.

He said although the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has used higher multipliers to emphasize economic impacts on communities, no one in the economic profession would believe multipliers are that high.

"A multiplier of six is higher than the U.S. economy's," Emerson said.

"I've been in business over 30 years, and I've been in situations where we've predicted what a job will do to an economy, and we've always used six as a factor," he said.

"Quite frankly, we stay away from it for this very reason," said Tom Whalen, director of operations for the chamber of commerce.

"I could sit and argue with someone over the issue all day, and still never get it resolved," he said.

Whalen said he believed the Chamber of Commerce had used the number six as a turnover at one time, and that it may have been misconstrued as a multiplier of six.

Dog urine and feces could fall from the top cage to the cage below it when the stacked cages are separated with wire and not a solid partition, Gonnerman said.

"This seems to be an unhealthy situation," she said.

Gonnerman said proper AKC identification of the dogs is important because the consumer should know from where the animal came.

The cracked concrete in the outside kennel pens could easily spread diseases from one pen to another, she said. Gonnerman also said the concrete may not have been treated properly to ward off any communicable diseases.

The debris outside the kennel could attract rodents and insects, Gonnerman said.

Gonnerman said the dogs might not be getting enough exercise and other behavioral-need requirements.

White was not present at the time of Gonnerman's visit and was unhappy that she did not notify him before touring the facilities.

"She could have scheduled a time with me and I would have taken her through the kennel," he said. "I have nothing to hide."

White said he does not think there have been any disease or sanitary problems at the kennel.

"I don't think there are any disease problems, and I feed the dogs good enough," he said.

White said he uses chlorine bleach to clean the concrete floors at the kennel and he feels the kennel is "more sanitized than ever."

"As far as the USDA regulations are concerned, I don't know if I have any problems at the kennel," he said.

White said he sees no problem with the cobwebs and the cracks in the concrete at the kennel.

"I have cracks in my concrete driveway at home," he said.

White said he does not abuse or mistreat his dogs and cats at the kennel.

"I love the animals here," he said.

Gonnerman said, "Love is not enough."

"This place is a possible disease haven for the animals," she said. "Something needs to be done."

Gonnerman said she hopes the situation at the kennel will prompt an inspection by a local veterinarian and public health officials.

Two former volunteers who no longer work at the kennel also said they saw sanitation problems there, even though White appeared to show a sincere interest in the animals' care and well-being.

Gonnerman also visited the Ogden animal shelter and the home of Pet Hotline operator, Bev Hashagen, said Su Bacon, president of the Riley County Humane Society.

"Local situations warranted the humane society's call to Ann Gonnerman in a consulting capacity," Bacon said.

Gonnerman said she has been making visits to other animal facilities and kennels across the country since she founded NSPA in 1983 as its president.

"I check to see if such places are meeting the minimum USDA standards for the care and regulations of the animals," she said.

In the early '70s, Gonnerman said, she inspected health conditions at zoos across the country, including a visit to the Sunset Zoo.

Gonnerman spoke to community members at the Cotton Club restaurant at 7:30 Wednesday night.

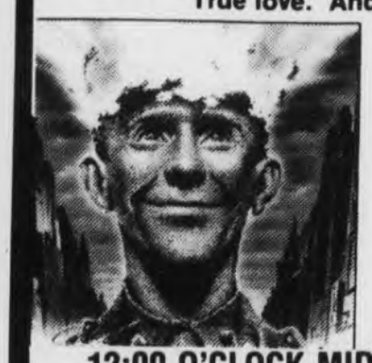
smuggling at the borders within 45 days.

Robert Sims, the Pentagon's chief spokesman, said the Defense Department was committed to assisting in the fight against drugs but could not support proposals to establish "a significant military role in police activities such as interdiction, arrests and search-and-seizure."

"Generally, Secretary (Caspar) Weinberger's view is that it is a bad precedent to use the Army as a police force," Sims said, adding that Deputy Defense Secretary William H. Taft IV had written a letter to congressional leaders earlier this week objecting to the proposals.

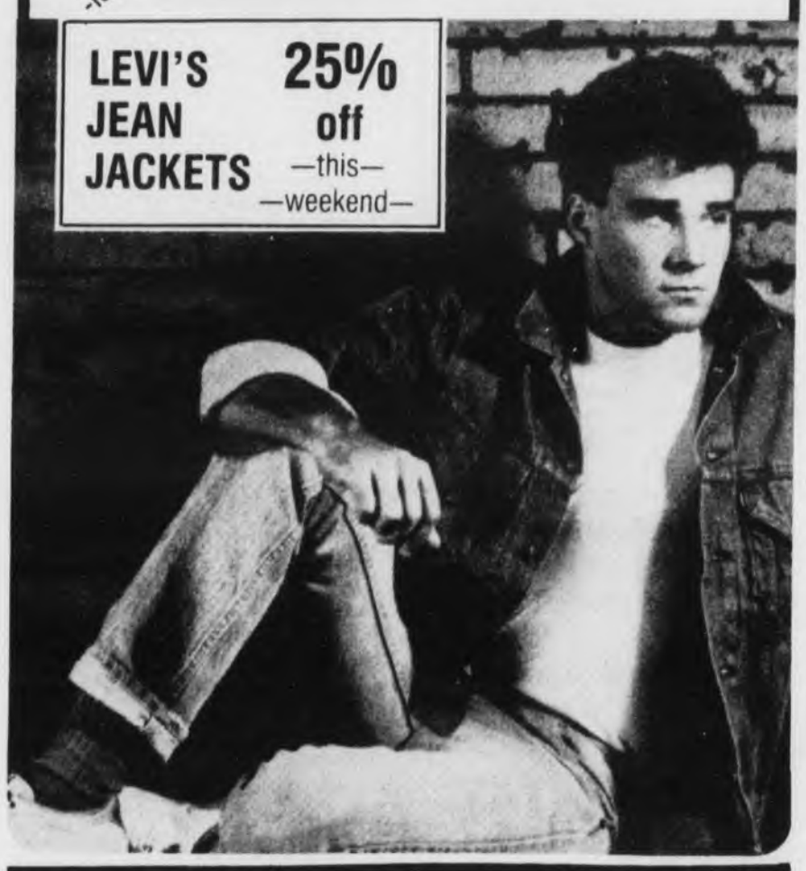
Taft, in the letter, urged Congress to maintain the "historic separation between military and civilian spheres of activity ..."

"We have learned through difficult experiences that reliance on military forces to accomplish civilian tasks is detrimental to both military readiness and the democratic process," he wrote.



Justice Department spokesman Terry Eastland reacted negatively to the increased military role, commenting, "The attorney general has expressed his own misgivings about such legislation and has said that any such legislation should at least make this a matter of discretion for the president instead of being mandatory."

"They can only arrest in hot pursuit," Hunter said in arguing for his amendment. "They can't kick in doors."



Rep. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said the plan was constitutional, adding, "If this is not defending the shores, than I don't know what is."

Now there's a programmable scientific calculator that solves even the most complex math, engineering and science problems in a BASIC way. The TI-74 BASICALC.

Unlike most other programmable calculators that require you to learn a new, complicated system of keystroke commands – in effect, a new programming language – the TI-74 BASICALC allows you to use the BASIC language programming you already know.

But don't let the BASICALC's ease of operation fool you. It also has more calculating power than comparably-priced programmables.

Your basic specs:
- Operates as a calculator or BASIC computer
- 8K RAM expandable to 16K RAM
- 70 built-in scientific functions
- Optional software cartridges for mathematics and statistics
- Optional PASCAL language cartridge
- Optional printer and cassette interface

And a variety of options, like software cartridges, are available that make it even more powerful and convenient.

Stop by and see the TI-74 BASICALC for yourself. In basic terms, what it really offers you is a bargain.

Poll shows students favor Hayden

K-Staters endorse liquor law, lottery, pari-mutuel

By RENEE BEAUDOIN
Government Editor

Speaker of the House Mike Hayden, the Republican candidate for governor, is leading the Democratic candidate, Lt. Gov. Tom Docking, by a substantial margin on the K-State campus, according to a random Collegian poll conducted of K-State students.

The results of the poll show Hayden leading his opponent with 40.9 percent of students favoring him. Docking had 22.4 percent of student support and 36.7 percent of students polled were undecided about the candidates.

A total of 445 students was polled by telephone for the results of this survey. However, not everyone answered all of the questions.

Of the students polled, 85 percent are undergraduates and 15 percent are graduate students. Sixty-one percent of the students are registered to vote, 22 percent plan to register before the Oct. 14 deadline, and 15 percent say they will not register to vote in this election.

When asked about the issues placed on the Nov. 4 ballot, student opinion was strong.

"I think there's too much debate about bringing Kansas up to modern times," said Alan Olson, junior in marketing. "It's about time Kansas became a state."

If the lottery measure is passed, it would allow for the establishment of a state lottery as Missouri and Colorado now have.

Enacting a state lottery in Kansas was favored by 75.9 percent of students polled. Fifteen percent were against the lottery with 9.1 percent undecided.

"I think it's a good idea," said Tim Bickhaus, graduate in regional and community planning. "Kansas should do it (lottery) here because money that could be generated in Kansas through sales is going to Missouri."

Pari-mutuel wagering would allow the state to build race tracks and other facilities that would allow for limited gambling in Kansas.

Pari-mutuel wagering was another issue where student opinion favored one side. Seventy percent of the students favored pari-mutuel wagering in Kansas, 14.7 percent were against the measure, and 15.3 percent were undecided.

The passage of the liquor-by-the-drink measure would mean the end of private reciprocal clubs. Bars that now must be within the club system could become open bars for those over the age of 21.

Liquor-by-the-drink was favored by 68 percent of the students, with 21 percent against the measure and 11 percent undecided.

"It's already too easy to get liquor whenever you want," said David Murray, freshman in general.

"As it is now, we need signs at the border that say, 'Entering Kansas. Set your watch back 400 years,'" said Dan Meigs, graduate in electrical engineering.

In a statewide Kansas poll, conducted by Central Research Corp. of Topeka for the Topeka Capital-Journal, results show Hayden to be the choice of 47 percent of those polled over Docking's 43 percent.

Although Docking holds a 51 percent lead in the 2nd Congressional District and a 45 percent lead in the 3rd District, the poll shows many voters are as yet undecided.

While the gubernatorial race is in full motion, the race for attorney general has barely begun — mainly because neither Robert Stephan nor Dennis Moore had a primary challenger.

Other poll results show Sen. Bob Dole is the favorite with 72 percent of votes against challenger Guy MacDonald's 19 percent.

The 2nd District's Jim Slattery drew 75 percent of the pollsters' votes while Pat Roberts of Kansas' 1st District was chosen by 80 percent of poll responses.

In the 4th District 67 percent of polled voters said they would vote for Democrat Dan Glickman. Republican Bob Whittaker received 74 percent of the polled votes in the 5th District.

The Rev. Richard Taylor and Gov. John Carlin point at each other while debating over the issue of liquor-by-the-drink Sunday afternoon at the Chautauqua Festival in Beloit. Approximately 500 people listened to the two men express their points of view on the subject.

Governor, lobbyist debate liquor law

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

BELOIT — Everyone voting in favor of liquor-by-the-drink will be held responsible for deaths related to drunk driving, the Rev. Richard Taylor said Sunday in his opening statement in a debate with Gov. John Carlin.

"It is the abuse of alcohol that creates problems, not the use," said Carlin. "The fact is, those who abuse alcohol will do so whether we have liquor-by-the-drink or not."

The debate, conducted at Chautauqua Park during a weekend of festivities called Beloit Chautauqua '86, attracted an audience of about 500 local citizens.

Both speakers gave a 10-minute opening speech, answered questions from the audience and ended with three minutes each for closing remarks.

Taylor, president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, a temperance organization, said amending liquor-by-the-drink legislation would result in an increase in alcohol consumption, alcoholics and drunk drivers. He said the increase would occur because access to liquor would rise dramatically as a result of the removal of the current club system.

While Carlin said Kansas essentially has liquor-by-the-drink because it is available with a club card, Taylor said the club card system is different in that it keeps alcohol consumption down.

"Consumption is the key to prevention," Taylor said. "Our laws permit liquor but do not promote it.

"The issue is not liquor-by-the-drink. The issue is liquor-by-the-drink in public places."

Carlin said overall drinking has not gone up in states that have passed liquor-by-the-drink laws, including Texas, Iowa and Oklahoma.

"In all those states, liquor consumption has steadily declined after temporary minor increases," he said.

While Taylor contended that allowing liquor sales in more establishments would make enforcement difficult, Carlin said eliminating membership cards would remove police officers from clubs and permit them to spend more time monitoring highways for drunk drivers.

Carlin said liquor-by-the-drink is not a consumption issue but an economic one. He said many Kansas restaurants are losing money because travelers and local citizens without club cards are prohibited from eating at them.

'Exciting grand tradition' marches on at Band Day

By JADA ALLERHEILIGEN
Collegian Reporter

At Saturday's football game, the K-State Marching Band was not alone in playing "Wildcat Victory" — 50 high school and junior high school Kansas bands joined in as well.

The 51st annual Band Day began early Saturday afternoon with a parade on Poyntz Avenue, said Stan Finck, director of the K-State Marching Band and assistant professor of music.

"Band Day is a grand tradition. It's exciting for all the bands involved, and it's good for the University," Finck said.

The parade lasted 1½ hours. Finck said the bands loaded up in their buses, and at least one or two members of the K-State band rode to KSU Stadium with each bus.

"On the bus ride to the stadium, we promoted the band and University and answered questions about the rest of the day's activities," said Sheila Hayter, sophomore in mechanical engineering and K-State band member.

Before the bands began rehearsing in the stadium late Saturday afternoon, President Jon Wefald addressed the visiting band members.

"This was the first time ever that a president of the University addressed the Senate may impeach federal judge

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal Judge Harry E. Claiborne, who as a private lawyer represented Frank Sinatra, Judy Garland and Howard Hughes, goes on trial in the Senate this week in the first impeachment case since 1936.

A nine-member prosecution team from the House will try to persuade senators that the Nevada judge, a federal prisoner, should be removed from office because of his 1984 conviction for tax evasion.

An unprecedented committee of 12 senators is to hear evidence Monday in the historic Senate Caucus Room, where the late Sen. Sam Ervin helped unravel the mysteries of Watergate in 1973 hearings.

On the 13 previous occasions since 1799 the entire Senate handled every phase of an impeachment case.

But faced with a busy pre-election schedule, the Senate delegated the committee to hear evidence and then turn the transcript over to the full chamber for further proceedings and a final ruling.

A seat has been reserved for Claiborne, 69, who is collecting his $78,700 annual salary while serving a two-year prison term at Maxwell Air Force Base, Ala. Since judges are appointed for life, he can only be removed by impeachment.

The trial will highlight a congressional week in which Philippine President Corazon Aquino addresses a joint meeting of Congress. That will occur Thursday, about the time the Senate may be considering across-the-board spending cuts under the Gramm-Rudman law. Those reductions, totaling about $20 billion, could occur if Congress fails to bring the deficit below $154 billion.

Before the Senate turns to the budget, however, it must finish debate and vote on the confirmation of William H. Rehnquist as chief justice and Antonin Scalia as an associate justice of the Supreme Court. Democrats have waged a campaign to defeat Rehnquist, but his confirmation by a wide margin is expected.

The Claiborne trial will capture its share of drama as well as history, since the defendant is a flamboyant judge known for his sharp criticism of the FBI and federal crime strike force attorneys.

The degree of excitement at the nationally televised trial may hinge on the impeachment committee's ruling on preliminary motions by the House and Claiborne attorney Oscar Goodman.

Goodman has asked for permission to "detail a conscious frame-up" by "cunning and ... devious men," including the very prosecutors and agents he criticized.

The House has asked that the full Senate not hold a full-blown trial, but simply rule Claiborne is guilty based on evidence.

Explosion kills 5 in Seoul airport

SEOUL, South Korea — A powerful explosive device blasted the crowded terminal building at Seoul's Kimpo International Airport on Sunday, killing five Koreans and injuring 19, police said.

Police said 13 victims were seriously hurt. Local news media accounts said as many as 35 people were injured in the air terminal, the main arrival point for the Asian Games set to open next Saturday.

A statement issued by Kang Min-chang, director of South Korea's national police, pointed an accusing finger at communist North Korea, charging North Korea with planning "impure, barbaric and wicked schemes aimed at disrupting the successful hosting of the games."

The statement said all the victims were Korean and that initial investigation found that "an explosive device" went off outside the terminal.

It said the midafternoon explosion occurred in or near a steel trash can outside the terminal's ground-floor waiting area.

Witnesses said the blast knocked about 50 people off their feet, and sent scores screaming and running away in panic.

Israel's Peres to meet with Reagan

TEL AVIV, Israel — Prime Minister Shimon Peres flew to Washington Sunday to meet President Reagan and to try to gain U.S. backing for the accord between Israel and Egypt calling for an international conference on the Middle East.

"A primary purpose in my trip will be to work out with the United States a peace policy for the future," Peres told reporters at Ben-Gurion International Airport. "The time has come to spell out what are the needed peace initiatives."

Peres, scheduled to meet Reagan today, also has arranged meetings with Vice President George Bush and Secretary of State George P. Shultz.

Miss America avoids controversy

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Newly crowned Miss America Kellye Cash said Sunday she won't answer questions about abortion or the Equal Rights Amendment because she doesn't believe America should be controversial.

"It would just be easier if you would all stop asking," she told reporters during her first news conference after being chosen Miss America 1987 in the pageant's televised finale Saturday night.

A Southern Baptist, Cash said her "very high, Christian, moral standards" direct her actions, and that she would never appear nude before a camera or live with a man before marriage.

She said he hoped to get married some day, but doesn't have a boyfriend.

Senator asks for reporter's return

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee called Sunday for "retaliatory action" against the Soviet Union, including no further talks toward a summit until American journalist Nicholas Daniloff is allowed to return home.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., said the Reagan administration should refuse to discuss anything but the Daniloff case at a pre-summit planning meeting with the Soviets this week unless Moscow frees the newsman.

"We expect Daniloff to come out. That would be the purpose of our taking retaliatory action, of our saying before (Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard) Shevardnadze arrives here, if he does arrive this week, that we anticipate the situation is going to be cleared up or the agenda for the meeting would be Daniloff alone," Lugar said on ABC's "This Week With David Brinkley."

Shevardnadze is scheduled to meet in a pre-summit planning session with Secretary of State George Shultz in New York on Friday and Saturday.

Reagans pledge drug abuse action

WASHINGTON — President Reagan — joined by his wife, Nancy, in appealing for a "great new, national crusade" — pledged aggressive government action against drug abuse Sunday but said the key to its success will be the courage of individual Americans.

"I will announce tomorrow a series of new proposals for a drug-free America," the president said in a joint address with the first lady from their living room in the White House.

Reagan said the proposals would bring federal spending on combatting illegal drugs to $3 billion.

"As much financing as we commit, however, we would be fooling ourselves if we thought that massive new amounts of money alone will provide the solution," he said in the prepared text of his speech.

"Your government will continue to act agressively, but nothing would be more effective than for Americans simply to quit using illegal drugs," the president said.

Man abandons Noah's Ark search

OVERLAND PARK — Former astronaut James B. Irwin, who has made several trips to Mount Ararat in eastern Turkey in hopes of finding Noah's Ark, says he is giving up the search for good.

"I think I've done all I can to attract attention to the ark. I think it is time others take up the search," Irwin said Saturday.

Irwin and seven others were detained by Turkish officials for one day last month on suspicion of espionage while the group looked for the biblical Ark.

Irwin said Saturday the explorers were detained on charges of making an illegal flight and taking illegal pictures, even though they had received approval to explore Mount Ararat. The pictures were later returned to them.

KSU Foundation markets 'technicpark'

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

Three years ago, the KSU Foundation began developing plans for a technicpark to stimulate new and old businesses in Manhattan.

Technicparks are research and office parks. The idea of these parks has been in existence for 25 years, said Dave Weaver, property manager of the park, which is located in the area of Claflin Avenue and Westport Road.

Any type of business, not only high tech busines, will be allowed to operate in the park. However, the business must have a solid tie with the University. These ties may be in the form of shared research, equipment, student training or other relations with the University. A basic function of this technicpark is to enhance business and University communication, Weaver said.

"Our goals are to bring in new businesses and to help develop projects that are already here," Weaver said.

The park leads to new enterprises in the University community. It aids in economic development through the creation of new products, said Robert Kruh, associate provost at K-State.

In 1983, the Foundation obtained almost 40 acres in the technicpark area. The Foundation had already owned 12 acres, and it bought the rest of the land from U.S.D. 383, which had plans to build a school on the property, Weaver said.

The Foundation had Westport Road and Haywood Drive put in, as well as sewer and water pipes installed. Two more cul-de-sacs are planned, but may or may not be constructed depending on the size and needs of the company or business, he said.

The park is divided into ½-acre lots. The companies may buy one or a combination of these lots, Weaver said.

The Kansas Wheat Commision is the only present occupant of the park. It was formerly located in Wichita, but because the commission had to come to the University so often, the commission moved its office to the technicpark, Weaver said.

The land is owned and marketed by the Foundation. The Foundation has no plans to open the park to companies that are not affiliated with the University.

Weaver said, "If we're not successful, we may have to re-examine our goals."

This could mean letting private enterprises in the park that are not with the University. The University of Kansas has done this with its park, he added.

No company can provide the research base of the University, Kruh said. Because venture capital is in short supply, the park allows the University to receive money from the financial sector and get more capital in return for the work and ideas produced by the University.

Lecturers should talk on students' concerns

The Landon Lecture Series on Public Affairs is "clearly America's most distinguished lecture series," said Vice President George Bush when he spoke at the lecture last year.

However, many recent lectures, including Bush's, have not lived up to his words. While speakers have had distinguished titles or positions, the subjects chosen by them have been less than ideal for a university audience.

Secretary of Education William J. Bennett's address last week exemplifies a trend of irrelevant and unoriginal subjects presented in the Landon Lectures. Although his speech on history was interesting, the University community probably would have preferred to hear a lecture on the future availability and current abuses of federal financial aid to students.

Bush's speech last year on the then upcoming Reagan/Gorbachev summit meeting was no exception to this trend. Instead of addressing issues concerning the economy or other areas in the political arena, he told us what we could have read in a news magazine.

The prestige of the Landon Lectures comes not only from the people who deliver it, but from what they have to say. Therefore, it is necessary for those selecting the lecturer to emphasize the originality and relevance of the topic to the University as it is to finding a dignitary to present the lecture.

Some of the responsibility for getting speakers to address current and controversial issues rests with students. If students who protest lecturers outside the lecture hall give them respect to present their views without rude interruptions during their speech, then future speakers will be more inclined to address relevant and controversial topics.

Band's energy ignites football game crowd

"Come on, come on, come on, baby — come on, baby! Twist and shout, twist and shout!"

The KSU Stadium crowd was trickling out of the stands early in the fourth quarter of Saturday night's football game against Northern Iowa. K-State was down 14-0, and the fans were giving up.

Then, with a blast from the trumpets of the KSU Marching Band, heads were turning, smiles were reappearing and students were once again facing the field.

Within moments, Section 24 was a mass of bumping bodies and singing voices. Spectators at the game were having fun. It's been years since the band has drawn such an overwhelming response from the crowd.

If spirit is what the University needs, then spirit is what it finally achieved. Although the song did not turn the tempo of the game, it did keep students in the stands and on their feet.

After two consecutive losses, the crowd will need more bursts of energy like the band's rendition of "Twist and Shout" to keep spirit going.

Thank you, band. You saved the evening.

Kennels must adhere to health regulations

A recent report filed with the Riley County Police Department against a local animal kennel raises several questions about the best way to care for homeless animals.

One problem is the conditions of the animal shelters. There are rules and guidelines that must be followed. It may seem insignificant that a kennel does not have windows, but sunlight contains an important vitamin most animals need to live.

The stacking of cages with no solid partition between them should in no way be overlooked. Anybody can figure out where the waste from the animal in the top cage goes.

There is the argument that at least these animals are not being "put to sleep," but maybe that would be preferable to the animal living in insufferable conditions.

The best solution for the problem is a foster home program for pets such as the one at the Manhattan Animal Shelter.

This is a good way for pet lovers, including students, to take care of a homeless pet and give it more love and attention than it could get in a shelter.

Deficit plagues athletic department

CATHERINE SAYLER
Guest Columnist

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis may be off and running Tuesday, and with the shape of the athletic department's budget, it's no wonder.

Travis is among four finalists selected for the athletic director's position at the University of Florida. Tuesday, University of Florida officials plan to announce their final choice.

The 1985-86 athletic department budget was released last Tuesday to members of the Athletic Fee Task Force. The task force, created by Student Senate last year to study the feasibility of a student athletic fee, found a $660,000 budget deficit with post-season expenses totaling $5,393,586 and income totaling $4,732,981.

When a task force member asked how the deficit was covered, Mike Jones, athletic department business manager, said, "Well, we have a reserve. But, to some extent, I spent this year's money to get through last year."

The $660,000 deficit "might be an all-time record loss," he added.

Last year's attendance at men's basketball games was the lowest in the history of Ahearn Field House, according to Jones. And this year's football ticket sales are down 600 student tickets and 108 faculty tickets.

Travis instituted budget reforms when he assumed the athletic directorship in February 1985. But, like most departmental reforms, it will take a while to see results.

One of the most glaring problems with the athletic department's budget is few coaches and department officials seem to understand the meaning of the word "budget." In practically every category, more was expended than was budgeted. In all, athletic department officials overspent $284,952.

Jones explained that overspending has been a common practice in the last few years. The athletic department's budget used to have a lot of padding, Jones said, and by overbudgeting in certain categories, the overspending of coaches and department officials was offset.

This practice began several years ago because, as Jones said, "He (former athletic department budget managers) knew he was going to have trouble with certain coaches. So, instead of going around and yelling at everybody (for overspending), he padded...The trouble is we've run out of padding."

Travis and Jones have a different approach to budgeting as Jones explained. "My philosophy is you (coaches) go over (the budget), and we'll get a different coach." Breaking people from what used to be common practice is difficult to do.

Last year Travis established the policy of purchase orders as a way to get some control over spending. "In the past, bills came in. And when bills came in, you paid them," Jones said. With purchase orders, accountants can know what is going to be spent rather than what has been spent.

Another looming financial problem for the athletic department is that of future expenses. The KSU Foundation has loaned the athletic department $2 million to pay for its share of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum. "We've got $153,000 or $155,000 in our account at the Foundation right now. That (the $2 million payback) is a problem."

At a Student Senate address Thursday, University President Jon Wefald said, "I think that the athletic department realizes that it doesn't have the money (to repay the $2 million). My feeling is that the Foundation will have to come up with the $2 million."

Even if the Foundation forgives the $2 million loan, there is still the question of coliseum utilities. The athletic department is slated to pay roughly one-third of the utilities costs. The estimates for yearly utilities costs range from $600,000 to $1 million. "As far as utilities, I don't know," Jones replied when asked how the athletic department planned to pay the bill.

No doubt, Travis' budget reforms will pay off in a few years. But for the present, the department is in financial trouble.

Last semester Travis proposed that every K-State student pay a $20-per-semester athletic fee, which would then allow students to attend games "free." The revenue from that fee would be $600,000 to $700,000 yearly and could help the department out of its financial woes.

The issue of whether students should "bail out" the athletic department by imposing a student fee will become a central one on campus this year.

The athletic department budget is on file in the Student Government Services office in the ground floor of the Union. The Athletic Fee Task Force meets at 5:30 p.m. Tuesdays in the SGS conference room. All meetings are open to the public.

Concerned students should review the athletic department budget and attend task force meetings. The athletic department's financial status merits a serious review.

This line disturbs me. It makes the presumption the war in Vietnam was a noble cause that was screwed up by the bureaucrats in Washington, D.C. Of course, Sylvester Stallone doesn't know much about the war. He managed to get a draft deferment so he could teach at a girls' school in Switzerland. But a lot of Americans still believe Vietnam was a war of good intentions and bad policy.

What were these good intentions? The Washington Post stated these as the effort to help South Vietnamese "to decide on their own form of government and social order." While these may have been the stated intentions, the actions of our government proved this merely a public relations ploy to gain support for the conquest of Southeast Asia.

When were we ever trying to help the people of Vietnam? Before 1954 our government was supporting the French who were trying to hold their colonial possessions in Southeast Asia. The paradox is that our support of French imperialism was because they supported us in our fight against British imperialism.

In 1954 the Geneva Accords, which established the division of Vietnam, were signed. France left Southeast Asia, and the United States stepped in. After a two-year stabilization period, elections were to be conducted and the country reunified. These elections never came about.

Nationalist leader Ho Chi Minh was popular in the North and South. He was responsible for kicking the French out of the country. The United States didn't think so highly of him, though. His appeals for American assistance against the French were rebuffed because he was a Communist. (We give money to everyone except Communists.) Even without American support, his rising popularity was sure to win him the presidency of a reunified Vietnam.

The United States also knew he was going to win. He even had majority support in the South. The thought of a Communist being popularly elected was more than the United States could bear. (This actually occurred in Chile in 1970 and was overthrown by the United States in 1973.) So they started undermining the accords almost before they were adopted. The United States installed the Diem regime and started a bloody repression against the forces in the South that fought the French. Only with American support was he able to stop the elections and the reunification of the country.

By 1959 the Viet Minh forces again took up armed struggle, realizing all hope for elections was lost. This time they were fighting their own people and the new imperialist power — the United States.

President Diem and his bloody regime were overthrown in 1963. He was succeeded by Gen. Khanh. It actually looked like there might be peace at this time. Khanh was trying to negotiate with the Buddhists and the Viet Cong. While this was a step toward peace, it was also interpreted as a step to free Vietnam from American influence. In the words of Ambassador Maxwell Taylor, such negotiations could lead to "a dangerous Khanh-Buddhist alliance which might eventually lead to an unfriendly government with which we could not work." So they kicked Khanh out of office. So much for peace.

Could we have been helping the people of Vietnam when we invaded them in 1965? The Vietnamese don't think so. A lot of them died because of it. The number of civilians killed exceeded that of the military. One writer stated that the blame for civilian casualties "rested with an enemy who fought by hiding behind civilians."

This is misleading. America's enemy was the civilians. As the Pentagon Papers historian put it, "Only the Viet Cong had any real support and influence on a broad base in the countryside."

The countryside, by the way, contained 80 percent of population. This is why the United States bombarded eveything in sight with napalm and agent orange. And realize that far more bombs were dropped on South Vietnam than the North. This was strategic terrorism on a massive scale. Bomb the people into submission and make them leave the countryside.

But the will of the people could not be broken, only bent. The North Vietnamese Army moved in as the American Army moved out. This government was a far cry from the ideas of Ho Chi Minh. The massive destruction and death left great psychological scars on the people. They may have their own government, but they lost the war of humanity.

Yet, we still try to hurt them. In 1977 India tried to ship 100 buffalo to Vietnam. The Vietnamese use buffalo to plow fields, pull carts and feed their families. The U.S. Army singled out buffalo as a threat to Democracy and took the time and expense to exterminate them. (The Old West Revisited?) The 100 buffalo were an attempt to replenish the species in Vietnam. The United States threatened to cancel Food for Peace aid if the buffalo were sent. They also tried to block shipments of pencils to Cambodia and shovels, which were to be used to dig up unexploded bombs, to Laos. And these countries were never officially in the war, but that is another story.

We continue this kind of tyranny to send a message to all other countries in our quasi-colonial system — you will get your butts kicked if you ever think of putting the people's interests before those of the United States. We are demonstrating this policy in Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatamala, Chile, Angola, South Africa and others.

This column is not a definitive history of Vietnam, just a few tidbits to get you started. It is important for you to know what is going on. A lot of lives depend on it.

New faculty help continue engineering's high standard

Editor's note: This article is the sixth in a series on new administration.

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Dean Donald Rathbone said the College of Engineering is maintaining its high standards of faculty quality with the six additional faculty members hired this year.

New in the Department of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science is Clarence Waters. Waters was previously an engineer with Professional Engineering Consultants in Wichita. Waters specializes in lighting and electrical systems. He received his bachelor's degree in architectural engineering from K-State in 1978.

Robert Lamb is a new assistant professor in the Department of Civil Engineering. Lamb was senior geotechnical engineer and assistant office manager at Trinity Engineering Testing Corp. in Corpus Christi, Texas. He has been a practicing civil engineer in the public and private sector for 13 years.

Kenneth Carpenter is joining the college as a professor in the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering. He was recently a professor of electrical engineering at the University of Missouri-Rolla. Carpenter's teaching specialties are in electromagnetics with research emphasis on fusion plasma diagnostics and electromagnetics.

Medhat M. Morcos joins the Department of Engineering Technology as an assistant professor. Morcos received his bachelor's and master's degrees in electrical engineering from Cairo University in Egypt. His last appointment was as an associate professor at the Egyptian Air Academy.

Joining the Department of Mechanical Engineering are Donald Fenton and Daniel Swenson. Fenton is an associate professor specializing in teaching and research of thermal science. He was a professor of mechanical engineering at New Mexico State University.

Swenson is a new assistant professor specializing in teaching and research of machine design and rock mechanics. He received his bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering from K-State in 1972.

Rathbone said that in addition to high faculty quality, the college has high student quality as well.

"Our students have had a lot of success, which we are really proud of," he said. "A lot of our students have done tremendously well in regional and national competitions."

A new program in the college is a Center of Excellence in Computer-Controlled Automation, which has been developed over the past two years to assist in industry research, Rathbone said.

"We've been working to expand our computer-aided engineering facilities here. By computer-aided, I mean using computers in design, manufacturing and graphics," he said.

"Many people just aren't aware that we are already using robotics and other computerized equipment in the college," he said. "Our major thrust in the last couple of years is to improve and expand these type of facilities."

Speaker discusses study methods

By JOHN EVANS
Collegian Reporter

An easier way to get good grades was revealed to University students Thursday night in the Union Ballroom by Steve Douglass, vice president of Campus Crusade for Christ national organization.

With the objective of making students "good thinkers, good learners and do it in less time," Douglass spoke to approximately 400 students on how they could improve their study skills and still have a good time.

"The main principle that will make the greatest difference in your grades is to attend class and sit in the front three rows," Douglass said.

Quoting from an article from USA Today, in a 10-year survey of 424 undergraduates at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, study time didn't make much difference in grades. The study found students who studied less than two hours got about the same grades, close to a B average, as those who spent more than six hours with the books. The study also said students with the lowest attendance earned the poorest grades.

Douglass had the students attending the speech probe into their lives to find causes that keep them from making better grades. For many, they found their problems rested in what he called the 80/20 rule, the secret to good grades.

"Eighty percent of the benefit from school can be derived from doing the right 20 percent of the activity well," Douglass said.

Students learned how to listen aggressively using the 80/20 rule and by using the acronym "SAFE." Douglass told students they should Scan, Ask, Focus and Explore when listening.

"Scan is the first word," he said. "The secret to aggressive listening is that your mind is like radar — you're alert, aware of what's going on around you and all that's being said.

"Second is ask. What did you mean? How does this work? How does this relate? These are questions you should be asking.

"Third is focus. When you determine something is worth attention, zero in on it.

"Last is explore. Examine and probe the topic in order to gain full understanding."

Another area Douglass covered was learning to think creatively or to "harvest your subconscious mind."

Thinking creatively can be done by loading one's mind on subjects, relaxing or sleeping and capturing ideas by writing them down immediately when one comes to mind, Douglass said.

Finally, Douglass told students how they could learn to like what they do by using the acronym REM (Remember, Enlist, Make).

"The key to doing anything we don't like is that we need to be motivated," he said. "And the best motivation is internal, not external.

"First, remember the reason for being in school and what the benefits are. Second, enlist a friend. If you don't like what you are studying, then find someone you like to study with. Third, make a game of it."

Nader speaks out for consumer rights

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

TOPEKA — Several hundred people received a lesson in consumer affairs Friday evening from one of the nation's leading consumer experts, Ralph Nader.

Nader's lecture, which lasted nearly 2½ hours in Washburn University's White Concert Hall, was the 16th in the Karl Menninger Lecture Series.

The lecture, "Consumer Affairs of the '80s," ranged in topics from the benefits of past efforts in consumer affairs to malpractice insurance practices and auto safety.

Nader said many problems are caused by rating the welfare of society by measuring the gross national product in a production-oriented economy.

He said the question that should be asked is, is the manufacturing of a product better for what and for whom?

Nader said that by using such methods of calculation, even traffic accidents are beneficial because of generated economic demand for emergency personnel, doctors, lawyers, mechanics, hospitals and others.

"(GNP) can grow even more if we have more crashes and deaths," he said.

Nader, who first become famous for his 1965 book, "Unsafe at Any Speed," said crash victims probably would not be comforted by being told, "Take it easy, at least your contributing to the GNP."

The book generally was aimed at unsafe products produced by General Motors Corp., and more specifically the Chevrolet Corvair.

He said economic growth need not be generated by industrial practices that cause pollution, resulting in the need to repaint houses regularly, or corrosion, which forces the replacement of machinery. Nader said growth can be developed through efforts to reduce malnutrition and create better housing and mass transit systems.

The lecturer said current practices may be better for production, but "maybe that's not best for the country."

A specific target of Nader was the insurance industry, particularly in the case of malpractice policies.

Nader said that several years ago, cycles of high profits and price wars generated premiums used for investments. He said lower interest rates in the early '80s caused a reduction in income from those investments, causing insurance companies to "raise premiums indiscriminately against innocent persons."

Using malpractice and day care centers as examples, Nader said premiums were increased from 400 percent to 1,000 percent across the board and not based on actuarial tables. He said in cases of premiums not being increased, reduced coverage for the same price was the result.

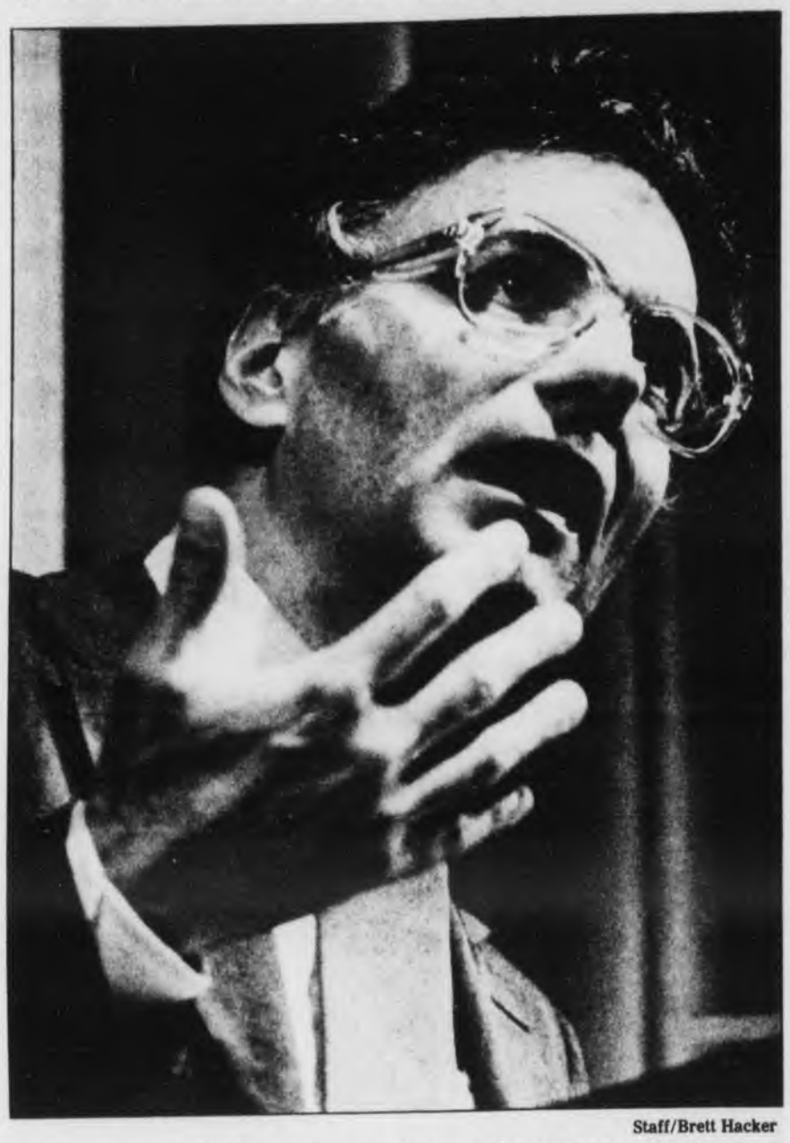
Nader said it was common for insurance companies to blame industries for making unsafe products and generating pollution. He said that while insurers didn't make the Ford Pintos with unsafe gas tank location, exploding Firestone 500 radial tires or IUDs for birth control, "they certainly represented them."

"Were the rights of victims changed to minimum standards?" Nader asked.

Nader said that in the case of malpractice claims, only 3 percent of the medical sector account for between 40 percent and 45 percent of malpractice cases. He said that "now, maybe one out of 20 malpractice victims receives compensation."

He also said he is opposed to ceilings on malpractice compensation, such as what is to be considered by the Kansas Legislature during the 1987 session.

Nader said insurance companies should use an actuarial premium base for rates and focus on prevention of losses. Examples cited by Nader included better labeling and notices on packaging and the institution of higher standards overall.



With the exception of the Allstate and State Farm Insurance companies, the insurance sector has done little to promote public safety, he said.

"They're feeding the public a line of bull, more than becoming a powerful sentinel," Nader said.

One example of safety in the auto industry cited by Nader was the introduction of collapsible steering columns.

Nader said the collapsible steering column was first built about 70 years ago but was not adapted until 1966.

"Auto executives made a decision," he said, that in case of a crash, "Your ribcage would be the thing to give," and not the steering column.

Student earns award for challenging life

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

Underwater photographer, Eagle Scout, guitarist, water safety instructor, scuba diving instructor, CPR instructor, paramedic substitute and karate forms, fighting and weapons champion — this is not a list of fun careers, it is a few of the many accomplishments of one person, Jeff Weatherly, senior in geology.

Weatherly received the Gold Congressional Award Sept. 6 at Lindsborg from Bob Whitiaker, Kansas' District Five Representative.

"The program was established by Congress to encourage young men and women to set goals and objectives in three areas; physical fitness and expeditions, personal development and voluntary public services," said Michael Robinson, Director of Field Services for Congressional Awards.

Congressional Awards are given in three divisions; the gold award is given to 20- to 23-year-olds with a total of 800 hours of activities, the silver is given to 17- to 19-year-olds with a total of 400 hours of activities, and the bronze is given to 14- to 16-year-olds with 200 hours of activities, Robinson said.

Meeting the 800 hours minimum requirements was no problem for Weatherly, 22, for he had well over 1700 hours for his gold award.

"The awards go to any young person who is eligible and willing to document their achievements," Robinson said. "We have given out 360 medals to date at all levels, but only 15 gold medals have been awarded."

Weatherly is the third Kansan to recieve a Congressional Award, he said.

Weatherly said he was nominated by his crew chief, Marvin Platner, emergency medical services captain of McPherson, Kan. Platner wrote to Washington for the Congressional Award application which Weatherly returned.

"I had to document all my activities for the last three years," he said. This included everything from canoeing across Canada to wrestling a 710-pound brown bear, he said.

The award represents his hard work and achievements, but more importantly, it represents the help others gave him, Weatherly said.

"I do a wide variety of things, but for each activity there are three or four people who are responsible for my doing that particular activity and make sure I do it well," he said.

"The award is a 'people' award. I consider it a gold medal for all the people who donated their time to train me and encourage me along the way," Weatherly said.

"The only thing that makes me eligible for this award is that I took the initiative to try different things. Anyone can accomplish as much and even more than I have by showing an interest and pursuing that interest until you have become proficient in that skill or activity. The most important thing is to remember to keep trying, even if you think something is out of your range. It may not be, and you will never know until you try," Weatherly said.

Geology colleagues honor first mentor

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

A conference room in Thompson Hall was dedicated to the University's first geology professor Saturday.

The B.F. Mudge Geology Conference Room, Thompson 208, will be used as a study room, a meeting room for students and faculty and a place to entertain guest speakers of the department. The room is still being built and should be completed soon.

Mudge was born in Maine in 1817 and grew up in Massachusetts. He moved to Kansas in 1861 and was director of the first Kansas Geological Survey in 1864. He was the first geology professor at K-State in 1867. He died in 1879.

Three of Mudge's great-grandchildren were in attendance at Saturday's dedication. Melville Mudge, Melville Thompson and Laureda Bunker are all K-State alumni.

Melville Mudge was a research geologist for the United States Geological Survey for 35 years. He spent five years in Kansas after he graduated from K-State in 1947.

"K-State does well in geology. You would be surprised at how many universities don't put an emphasis in field studies," he said.

Mudge, 65, has won several alumni awards from the University. He is retired and living in Colorado.

K-State offense falters in 17-0 loss

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

From here, the task becomes even more difficult.

Losing on the road to Texas Tech, an NCAA Division I-A member of the Southwest Conference was one thing. Chalk it up to experience.

But Saturday night's 17-0 loss at KSU Stadium to Northern Iowa, a Division I-AA member of the Gateway Conference, is another matter altogether.

Even K-State Coach Stan Parrish, an optimistic man by most anyone's definition, admits resurrecting the downtrodden 'Cats will be extremely difficult.

"Obviously, it's a setback for us. These kids have had so many setbacks," Parrish said. "Getting back off the deck now will be tough. But we're going to go back to work Monday and hopefully iron some things out."

Not only were the 'Cats dominated by Northern Iowa, K-State allowed the Panthers to "beat us on both sides of the ball," Parrish said. "We got whipped."

While admitting that Northern Iowa played well, Parrish was quick to accept blame for the loss.

"It's my fault. We just didn't get it done in a ballgame I thought we should have won," he said.

The loss was K-State's third in four tries in the last two years against I-AA competition (the third loss was 22-10 to North Texas State). Northern Iowa beat the 'Cats 10-6 last year at KSU Stadium, prompting the resignation of former Coach Jim Dickey.

Parrish said the players didn't underestimate Northern Iowa.

"It may have looked it, but we didn't," he said. "Maybe you can't control human nature as much as you think you can."

K-State's schedule doesn't become any more accomm either. No m
'Cats to feast

opponent next week at Fort Worth. From there, the 'Cats take a week off before meeting Oklahoma at Norman to open Big Eight Conference play.

A fierce Northern Iowa blitz kept K-State from getting untracked offensively. The Panthers sacked Wildcat quarterbacks Randy Williams and John Welch four times and applied enough pressure to hold the Wildcats to 5-of-26 passing for only 78 yards and three interceptions.

"They just totally confused us in our offense," Williams said. "I think we have to come up with some different plays to go with in those situations."

K-State attempted — without success — to establish the passing attack early in the game to keep the Panthers from blitzing.

"They would come up in a blitz coverage or a man coverage and when I would change the play at the line, they would drop back into a different coverage after I had already made the audible," Williams said.

After Williams completed just two of 14 passes in the first quarter and most of the second, Parrish inserted Welch into the game with 4:36 to go in the first half. Welch left the game after the third quarter with a broken wrist.

Defensively, especially early in the game, Northern Iowa had the Wildcats just as baffled.

Using both the run and pass with equal success, the Panthers marched down the field on their second possession of the game, beginning a drive at the 14-yard line that resulted in the first touchdown of the game.

The 'Cats' defensive problems were compounded by the fact K-State played the game without starting noseguard Tim MacDonald, who left the team Saturday morning. Details about MacDonald's departure were unavailable Sunday.

Three passes from Northern Iowa

Adjustments Northern Iowa made after its 16-16 tie with Mankato State last week appeared to pay off.

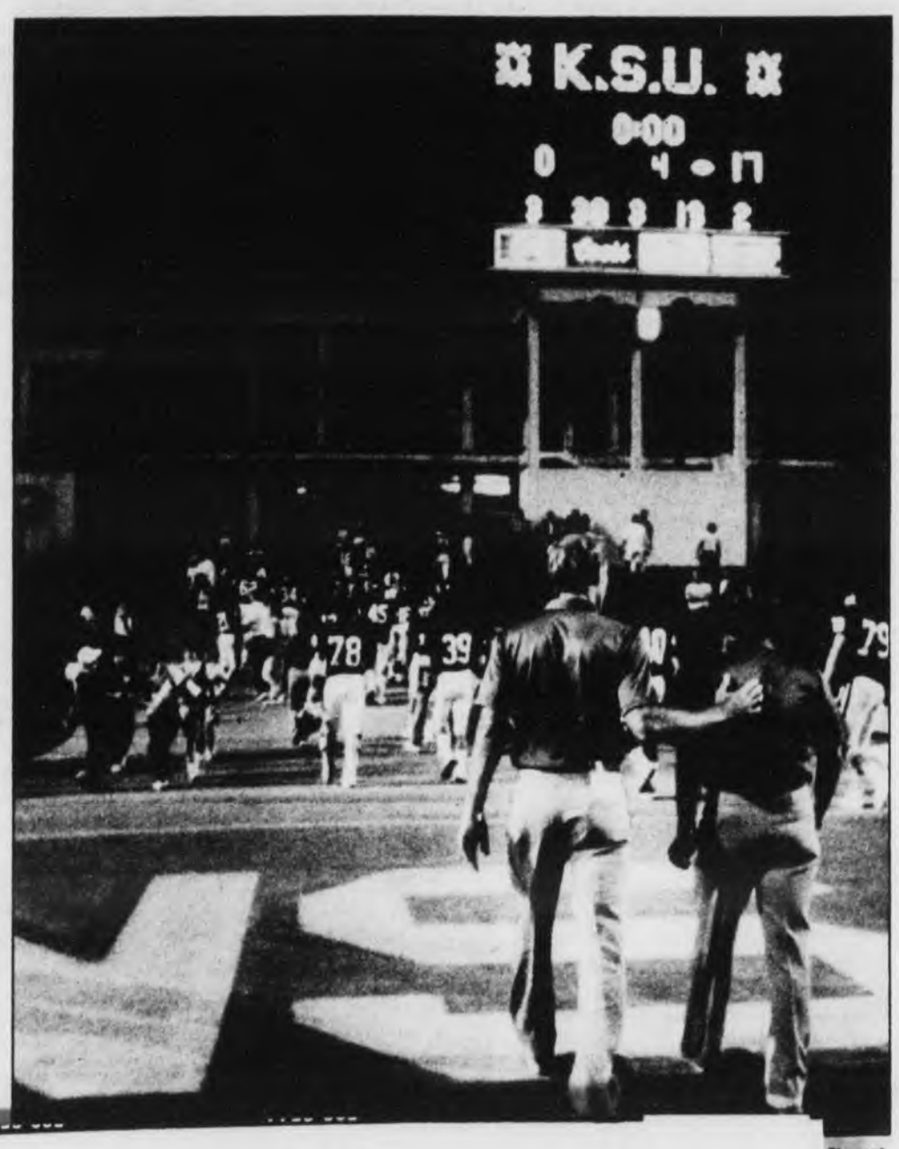
One of the few bright spots in the Wildcats' pass coverage was the play of defensive back Steve Compton, who had two interceptions.

The Panthers' second touchdown came late in the first quarter after linebacker Mark Farley intercepted a Williams pass at the K-State 18-yard line and returned it to the five. Fullback Errol Peebles scored on a 3-yard run two plays later.

An 18-yard field goal early in the fourth quarter by Mike Angell closed out the scoring.

Losing for the second consecutive year to Northern Iowa was a bitter pill for Wildcat players to swallow.



"It's really hard losing to a team that ruined your season last year and it's hard again this year," offensive guard Bob Bessert said. "You've got to really bounce back.

"This year we had a good team and we thought we were going to do well. It's a cold slap in the face."

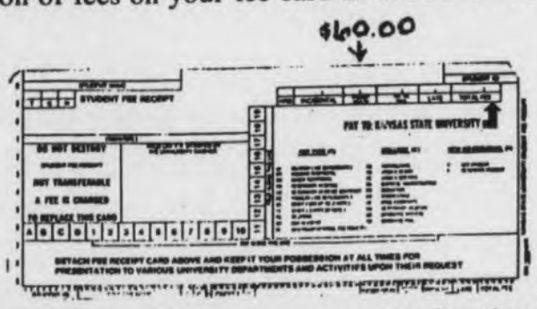
YOU ARE WELL WORTH IT!

WHY LAFENE IS CALLED 'LAFENE'

WE SALUTE Dr. Ben Lafene, 80 years young and still residing in Manhattan, Kansas. As medical director from 1949-1961, Dr. Lafene was a key figure in getting the present facility built back in the late 1950s. For perspective, here's a brief but exciting history of "Student Health" at KSU.

KSU was established in 1863, but no health facility existed until 1913. The first clinic was located on the second floor of Anderson Hall. Students were assessed 50¢ a semester! (Time and costs continue to march on.) In 1920, a two-story stone house built in 1866 and near the present-day location served as K-States first hospital. This stone house had also served as home to Presidents Anderson and Fairchild.



After WWII, one- and two-story surplus military barracks were hauled south of the old stone house to serve as clinic, hospital and emergency room. The facilities were somewhat appalling by report: flimsy, cramped, thin walls, cold in winter, freezing pipes. Approximately the same time, a much better veterinary hospital was built at KSU. Perhaps it is during this era at many universities in the evolution of student health that the term "student death" was coined. At any rate, students detested the place as did parents. THANKS to STUDENTS discontent and demands, pressure was applied for state legislative funding with success. Dr. Lafene wrestled with committees and architects, even with the proposal by some to remodel the old veterinary hospital for human use.

President McCain decided on the present location for the "new" clinic-hospital. Student health money ($20,000) was spent to move the medical barracks out of the way. Construction at a cost of $550,000 was started in 1958; the medical staff occupied the new facility in November 1959. In honor of Dr. Lafene's successful struggle with and for the students of KSU, President McCain named the new facility "LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER." Dr. Lafene, our thanks!

What makes it "YOUR MEDICAL FACILITY?"

The Lafene Health Center is one of only a few university-provided services which is available only to fee paying, registered students at K-State. The Health Center, a non-profit facility, is supported entirely by students and is therefore available only to students. It is indeed "YOUR MEDICAL FACILITY." Here's how you support it.

At the beginning of each semester, you pay a health fee which is included directly in your tuition. Look for it in the itemization of fees on your fee card as shown below.

The health fee is $60.00 per semester for the 1986-87 academic year. It is applied to the operating budget of the health center to pay for the trained professional staff, facility operation and maintenance, medical equipment and supplies. But the health fee is not adequate to complete the health center's budget. The remaining operating expences are recovered through fees assessed to individual users for specific services and supplies.

The student health fee entitles you to all the services available at Lafene Health Center. Please note that this health fee is not a substitute for health insurance, rather, it acts as a kind of prepaid health plan under which you are entitled to certain basic services at no additional charge. These are:
—visits as needed with the staff physician of your choice;
—consultations as needed with outpatient nursing staff;
—nutritional consultations as needed with a registered dietitian;
—health education materials and consultation with a health educator or other professional staff for educational purposes.
—much more

K-State offense falters in 17-0 loss

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

From here, the task becomes even more difficult.

Losing on the road to Texas Tech, an NCAA Division I-A member of the Southwest Conference was one thing. Chalk it up to experience.

But Saturday night's 17-0 loss at KSU Stadium to Northern Iowa, a Division I-AA member of the Gateway Conference, is another matter altogether.

Even K-State Coach Stan Parrish, an optimistic man by most anyone's definition, admits resurrecting the downtrodden 'Cats will be extremely difficult.

"Obviously, it's a setback for us. These kids have had so many setbacks," Parrish said. "Getting back off the deck now will be tough. But we're going to go back to work Monday and hopefully iron some things out."

Not only were the 'Cats dominated by Northern Iowa, K-State allowed the Panthers to "beat us on both sides of the ball," Parrish said. "We got whipped."

While admitting that Northern Iowa played well, Parrish was quick to accept blame for the loss.

"It's my fault. We just didn't get it done in a ballgame I thought we should have won," he said.

The loss was K-State's third in four tries in the last two years against I-AA competition (the third loss was 22-10 to North Texas State). Northern Iowa beat the 'Cats 10-6 last year at KSU Stadium, prompting the resignation of former Coach Jim Dickey.

Parrish said the players didn't underestimate Northern Iowa.

"It may have looked it, but we didn't," he said. "Maybe you can't control human nature as much as you think you can."

opponent next week at Fort Worth. From there, the 'Cats take a week off before meeting Oklahoma at Norman to open Big Eight Conference play.

A fierce Northern Iowa blitz kept K-State from getting untracked offensively. The Panthers sacked Wildcat quarterbacks Randy Williams and John Welch four times and applied enough pressure to hold the Wildcats to 5-of-26 passing for only 78 yards and three interceptions.

"They just totally confused us in our offense," Williams said. "I think we have to come up with some different plays to go with in those situations."

K-State attempted — without success — to establish the passing attack early in the game to keep the Panthers from blitzing.

"They would come up in a blitz coverage or a man coverage and when I would change the play at the line, they would drop back into a different coverage after I had already made the audible," Williams said.

After Williams completed just two of 14 passes in the first quarter and most of the second, Parrish inserted Welch into the game with 4:36 to go in the first half. Welch left the game after the third quarter with a broken wrist.

Defensively, especially early in the game, Northern Iowa had the Wildcats just as baffled.

Using both the run and pass with equal success, the Panthers marched down the field on their second possession of the game, beginning a drive at the 14-yard line that resulted in the first touchdown of the game.

The 'Cats' defensive problems were compounded by the fact K-State played the game without starting noseguard Tim MacDonald, who left the team Saturday morning. Details about MacDonald's departure were unavailable Sunday.

... passes from ... Northern Iowa ... tempts.

Adjustments Northern Iowa made after its 16-16 tie with Mankato State last week appeared to pay off.

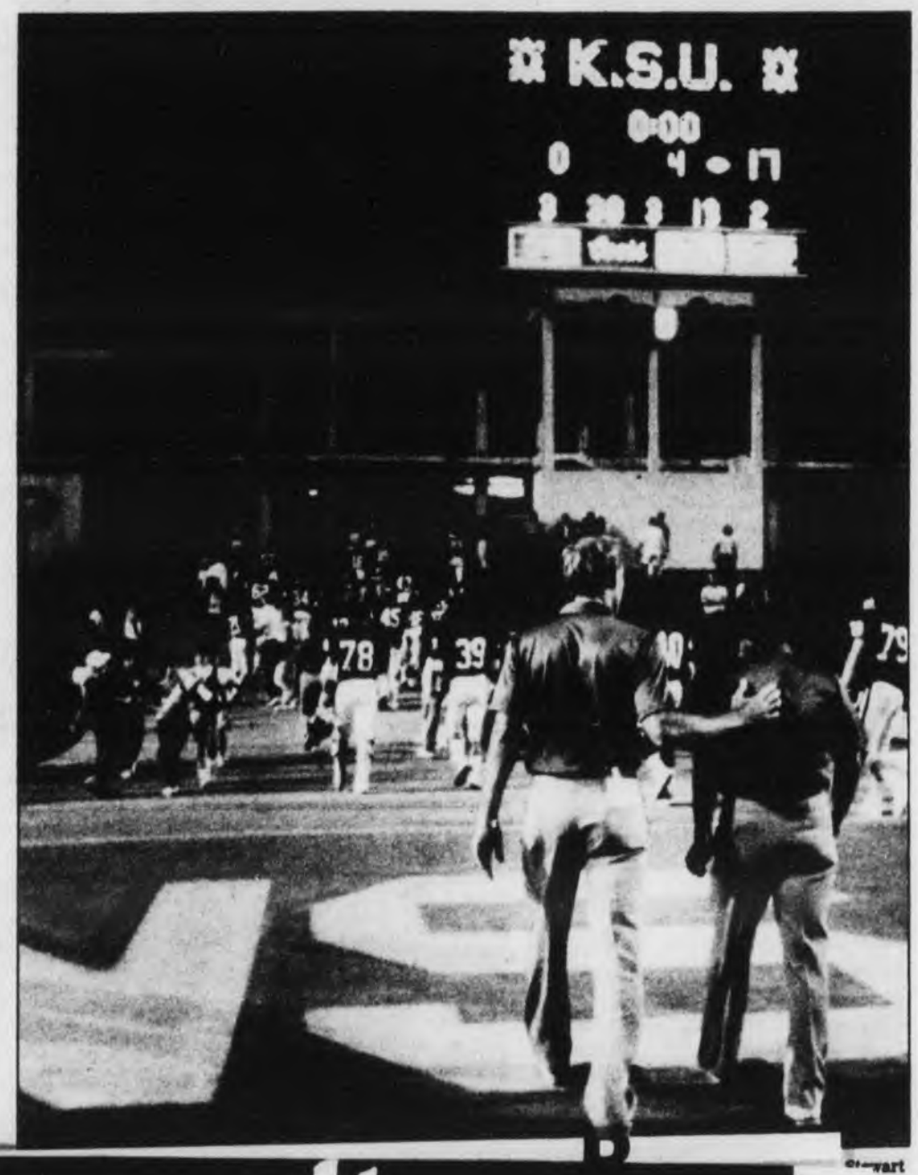
One of the few bright spots in the Wildcats' pass coverage was the play of defensive back Steve Compton, who had two interceptions.

The Panthers' second touchdown came late in the first quarter after linebacker Mark Farley intercepted a Williams pass at the K-State 18-yard line and returned it to the five. Fullback Errol Peebles scored on a 3-yard run two plays later.

An 18-yard field goal early in the fourth quarter by Mike Angell closed out the scoring.

Losing for the second consecutive year to Northern Iowa was a bitter pill for Wildcat players to swallow.

"It's really hard losing to a team that ruined your season last year and it's hard again this year," offensive guard Bob Bessert said. "You've got to really bounce back.



"This year we had a good team and we thought we were going to do well. It's a cold slap in the face."

YOU ARE WHAT YOU EAT . . .

Now that you are on your own, either eating resident hall food, or cooking for yourself in your apartment, what will you eat? Mom always said to eat three meals a day and for sure don't skip breakfast. Finally, you can forget all that, since no one is looking over your shoulder.

A donut and soda will do for breakfast (if you have any at all), fast-food for lunch, and pizza with beer for a late dinner. Is this how you will assert your newly found independence? Or is eating right (whatever that means) more important than filling the gut?

Lafene Health Center is staffed with a registered dietitian who can guide you with your food and nutritional questions and concerns. She won't be like mom, but she can help you:

—plan a special diet
—assess your food intake and eating habits
—lose the "freshman 10"—(the pounds gained in the first year of college)
—achieve good taste and looks in food, and nutrients too

For an appointment or for additional nutritional information, you can contact the dietitian by calling 532-6544.

K-State offense falters in 17-0 loss

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

From here, the task becomes even more difficult.

Losing on the road to Texas Tech, an NCAA Division I-A member of the Southwest Conference was one thing. Chalk it up to experience.

But Saturday night's 17-0 loss at KSU Stadium to Northern Iowa, a Division I-AA member of the Gateway Conference, is another matter altogether.

Even K-State Coach Stan Parrish, an optimistic man by most anyone's definition, admits resurrecting the downtrodden 'Cats will be extremely difficult.

"Obviously, it's a setback for us. These kids have had so many setbacks," Parrish said. "Getting back off the deck now will be tough. But we're going to go back to work Monday and hopefully iron some things out."

Not only were the 'Cats dominated by Northern Iowa, K-State allowed the Panthers to "beat us on both sides of the ball," Parrish said. "We got whipped."

While admitting that Northern Iowa played well, Parrish was quick to accept blame for the loss.

"It's my fault. We just didn't get it done in a ballgame I thought we should have won," he said.

The loss was K-State's third in four tries in the last two years against I-AA competition (the third loss was 22-10 to North Texas State). Northern Iowa beat the 'Cats 10-6 last year at KSU Stadium, prompting the resignation of former Coach Jim Dickey.

Parrish said the players didn't underestimate Northern Iowa.

"It may have looked it, but we didn't," he said. "Maybe you can't control human nature as much as you think you can."

K-State's schedule doesn't become any more accommodating from here on out, either. No more supposed patsies for the 'Cats to feast on. Texas Christian, a 48-31 winner over Tulane Saturday, is K-State's opponent next week at Fort Worth. From there, the 'Cats take a week off before meeting Oklahoma at Norman to open Big Eight Conference play.

A fierce Northern Iowa blitz kept K-State from getting untracked offensively. The Panthers sacked Wildcat quarterbacks Randy Williams and John Welch four times and applied enough pressure to hold the Wildcats to 5-of-26 passing for only 78 yards and three interceptions.

"They just totally confused us in our offense," Williams said. "I think we have to come up with some different plays to go with in those situations."

K-State attempted — without success — to establish the passing attack early in the game to keep the Panthers from blitzing.

"They would come up in a blitz coverage or a man coverage and when I would change the play at the line, they would drop back into a different coverage after I had already made the audible," Williams said.

After Williams completed just two of 14 passes in the first quarter and most of the second, Parrish inserted Welch into the game with 4:36 to go in the first half. Welch left the game after the third quarter with a broken wrist.

Defensively, especially early in the game, Northern Iowa had the Wildcats just as baffled.

Using both the run and pass with equal success, the Panthers marched down the field on their second possession of the game, beginning a drive at the 14-yard line that resulted in the first touchdown of the game.

The 'Cats' defensive problems were compounded by the fact K-State played the game without starting noseguard Tim MacDonald, who left the team Saturday morning. Details about MacDonald's departure were unavailable Sunday.

Three passes from Northern Iowa quarterback Mike Smith to Panther receivers resulted in first downs in the initial touchdown drive. Smith passed for 296 yards in the game by completing 24 of 35 attempts.

Adjustments Northern Iowa made after its 16-16 tie with Mankato State last week appeared to pay off.

One of the few bright spots in the Wildcats' pass coverage was the play of defensive back Steve Compton, who had two interceptions.

The Panthers' second touchdown came late in the first quarter after linebacker Mark Farley intercepted a Williams pass at the K-State 18-yard line and returned it to the five. Fullback Errol Peebles scored on a 3-yard run two plays later.

An 18-yard field goal early in the fourth quarter by Mike Angell closed out the scoring.

Losing for the second consecutive year to Northern Iowa was a bitter pill for Wildcat players to swallow.

"It's really hard losing to a team that ruined your season last year and it's hard again this year," offensive guard Bob Bessert said. "You've got to really bounce back.

"This year we had a good team and we thought we were going to do well. It's a cold slap in the face."

Quarterback woes persist for Wildcats

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

During preseason football drills, Stan Parrish knew his "air" offense would either fly or fall depending on quarterback Randy Williams' confidence.

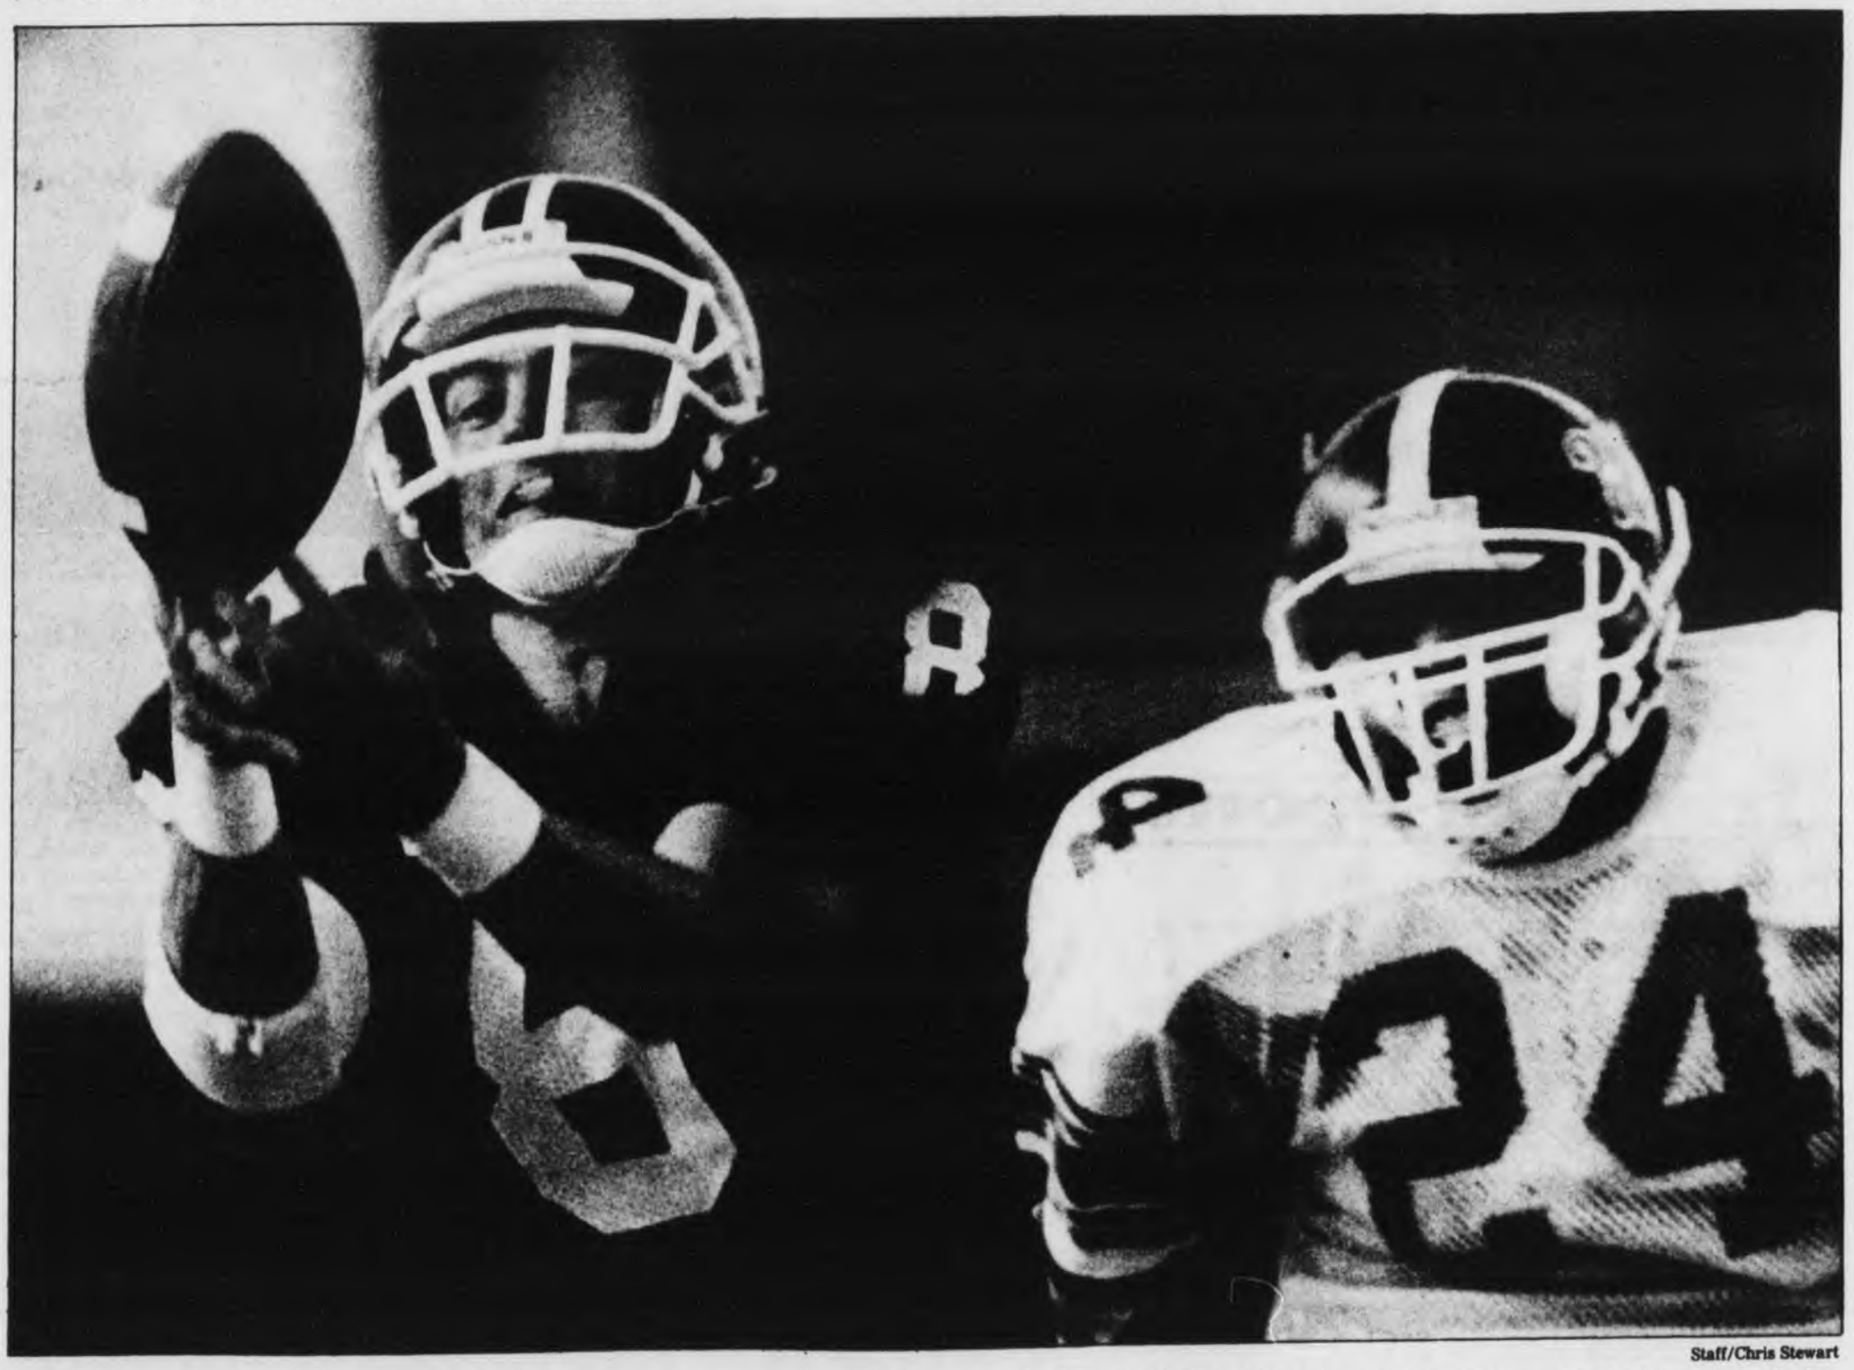
Parrish said he believed in the junior from Jacksonville, Fla. Team members said they believed in the signal caller's arm. And Williams said he believed in himself.

They agreed that all that was left was to convince fans and the students of Williams' abilities.

Well, it seemed like old times Saturday night at KSU Stadium when the Wildcats were, in Parrish's words, "whipped" 17-0 by the Northern Iowa Panthers.

Last year Williams suffered through a season filled with so much misery he said he never wanted to experience the same torment again.

In 1985 Williams completed only 63 of 151 passes and tossed 12 interceptions. The nightmare continued Saturday as Williams threw two interceptions and connected only three times in 19 attempts.



When asked about his quarterback's confidence, the dejected Parrish simply said, "It's a tough thing. I think he'll bounce back."

When it became clear Williams was not going to get the job done against the Panthers, Parrish and offensive coordinator Ken Bowman looked for the solution from the same man to whom interim coach Lee Moon looked last season — John Welch.

At times it seemed Welch might get the job done. But the senior reserve broke his wrist and finished the night completing two of seven passes with one interception.

After the game Williams said he would bounce back from the nightmarish game.

Winning programs, enrollment seem teamed

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the first of a five-part series titled "College Athletics in America." The series will run throughout this week on the sports page.

With K-State's enrollment down thousands of students from only three years ago, Athletic Director Larry Travis is prepared to do his part to recover K-State's lost students.

"I think our athletic program, if we go about it with integrity and work, can make this institution grow," Travis said.

President Jon Wefald knows athletic success is a vital part to his efforts of turning around the downward trend of K-State's enrollment, but he makes it clear he doesn't want to overemphasize its importance.

"I wouldn't want to overrate that. The key thing is to have solid academic programs," Wefald said. "Academics should come first, second, third and fourth."

Although he wishes it was different, Wefald recognizes the fact K-State's intercollegiate athletic teams' records can have a positive influence on the school's image.

"If you talk to someone from Nebraska, Oklahoma or Michigan, they would tell you successful athletic teams are important to the overall school image," Wefald said.

Wefald points out the Boston College study, in which researchers claim there was a marked increase in the school's enrollment during the period when Doug Flutie was quarterbacking the Eagles' football team toward the top of the national rankings.

Travis has no doubts about it — K-State has to be successful on the athletic field for the good of the school's image.

"That's our goal, to make our athletic program such that it gives a positive image for this institution," Travis said. "Academically, we enjoy a very good reputation. But athletically, we've been less than we should have been.

"So, people have a tendency to judge what's going on on our college campus by how many football and basketball games are won. It's a sad situation, but that's the way it is."

There is no need to try and convince Mike Russell of the importance of a visible athletic program.

Russell is the president of the athletic association at the University of Missouri-Kansas City. He has headed a charge to convert the Kangaroos' basketball program from a small-college budget to the National Collegiate Athletic Association's Division I-A.

UMKC recently hired former University of Mississippi basketball coach Lee Hunt to build a basketball program that will be able to walk onto the court with any team in the nation.

Prior to Mississippi, Hunt worked under

Jayhawks take three straight

Wildcat spikers grab second at Invitational

By RON RENO

K-State's volleyball squad captured second place in its own tournament for the second straight week, this time at the 10th Annual Kansas State Invitational Friday and Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

In last weekend's invitational, the Wildcats were runners-up to the University of Kansas and finished ahead of Wichita State and Drake in the four-team, round-robin tourney.

Last week the 'Cats took second behind Northwestern in the Pepsi/KSU Invitational.

"I think (this weekend's) tournament went real true to form," K-State Coach Scott Nelson said. "From what I had learned about our opponents and what I had expected out of them, I think Kansas was the best ball-control team. They were the best of all the teams (we've played) at this point in the season."

K-State was without two of its top three players during the tournament. Junior Mary Kinsey was out with a stress fracture to her left foot, and senior Helen Bundy is still recovering from ligament damage in her knee.

"It's not so much just their play (that is missed)," Nelson said. "It's their ability to concentrate, keep the team playing well as a team, keeping errors to a minimum. Those are the things we kind of struggled with."

The 'Cats, 4-2, opened the tournament with a four-game victory Friday afternoon over the Drake Bulldogs, 15-6, 13-15, 15-12 and 15-7.

Against Kansas the K-State spikers took the Jayhawks to four games before losing 15-13, 11-15, 15-9 and 15-9 Friday evening. Kansas, 4-0, made fewer errors and exhibited superior ball-control skills in defeating the Wildcats.

Kansas was led by the play of sophomore Catalina Suarez of Bogota, Colombia. Suarez was voted the tournament's most valuable player.

Also voted to the all-tournament team were Kansas teammates Monica Spencer and Julie Ester, Wichita State's Kari James, Drake's Kelly Brantmeier and the Wildcats' Shawnee Call, a sophomore, and senior Cindy Durham.

K-State was fortunate to escape with a five-game victory in their match against a less-experienced Wichita State team on Saturday. The Wildcats won 16-14, 10-15, 12-15, 15-2 and 15-13.

Despite substandard play of the entire squad at times, Nelson said he was pleased with the way his team bounced back in the Wichita State match.

"Our team is so young that it's nice to have composure under a lot of pressure like that," he said.

Nelson saw plenty of other bright spots during the 'Cats three matches, citing the play of Durham and juniors Kelley Carlson and Kristi Jacquart.

"I think we played just about where we're at right now," Nelson said. "I don't think we played above our heads, and I don't think we played awful. I think we played just about where I anticipated we'd be."

In other matches during the tournament, Kansas defeated both Wichita State and Drake in three games, and Wichita State beat Drake in three games.

Royals' win sparked by Bo's homer

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Jorge Orta drove in four runs and rookie Bo Jackson hit the longest home run in Royals' Stadium history for his first major league homer as the Kansas City Royals beat the Seattle Mariners 10-3 Sunday.

Right-hander Mark Gubicza, 10-6, gave up two runs in six innings to win for the 10th time in his last 12 decisions.

Royals officials said Jackson's home run, which hit near the top of a grassy embankment in left-center field, was the longest ball ever hit at the stadium.

Jackson's drive off Seattle starter Mike Moore, 10-2, carried approximately 475 feet, about three feet further then a ball hit by former Chicago White Sox slugger Dick Allen in 1974.

Royals officials and veteran press box observers called it the longest home run hit in this stadium, which opened in 1973.

A chart of the longest balls hit in Royals Stadium showed that Jackson's drive landed approximately three to five feet past Allen's home run.

The home run came in the fourth inning which made the score 4-0, and ignited a five-run fourth inning that gave Kansas City an 8-0 lead.

Orta hit a two-run home run that completed the Royals' scoring in the fourth. He also singled twice in Kansas City's 15-hit attack.

Seattle's Jim Presley had a two-run single in the fifth and Ken Phelps hit an RBI double in the eighth.

The Royals open a three-game series at Anaheim against the division-leading California Angels Tuesday, and go to Seattle for a series against the Mariners Friday.

Little Apple Triathalon entries total almost 250

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Approximately 250 athletes competed in the fourth annual Little Apple Triathlon Saturday at the River Pond State Park at Tuttle Creek Lake.

"We did get our maximum number of participants," said Joyce Halverson, race coordinator and assistant director of recreational services.

The Little Apple Triathlon comprises three events: .3-mile swim, 11.3-mile bike ride and a 3.1-mile run. Halverson called the event "a big success" mainly because none of the participants sustained any serious injuries.

"We did have a few minor injuries," she said. "One male slid out of his bike and received some abrasions, one person had to be pulled from the water, and one woman hyperventilated. But I feel fortunate we didn't have any major injuries this year."

Scott Johnson was the men's overall champion as he defeated last year's title winner Chuck Kirmse with a time of 58 minutes, 8.88 seconds.

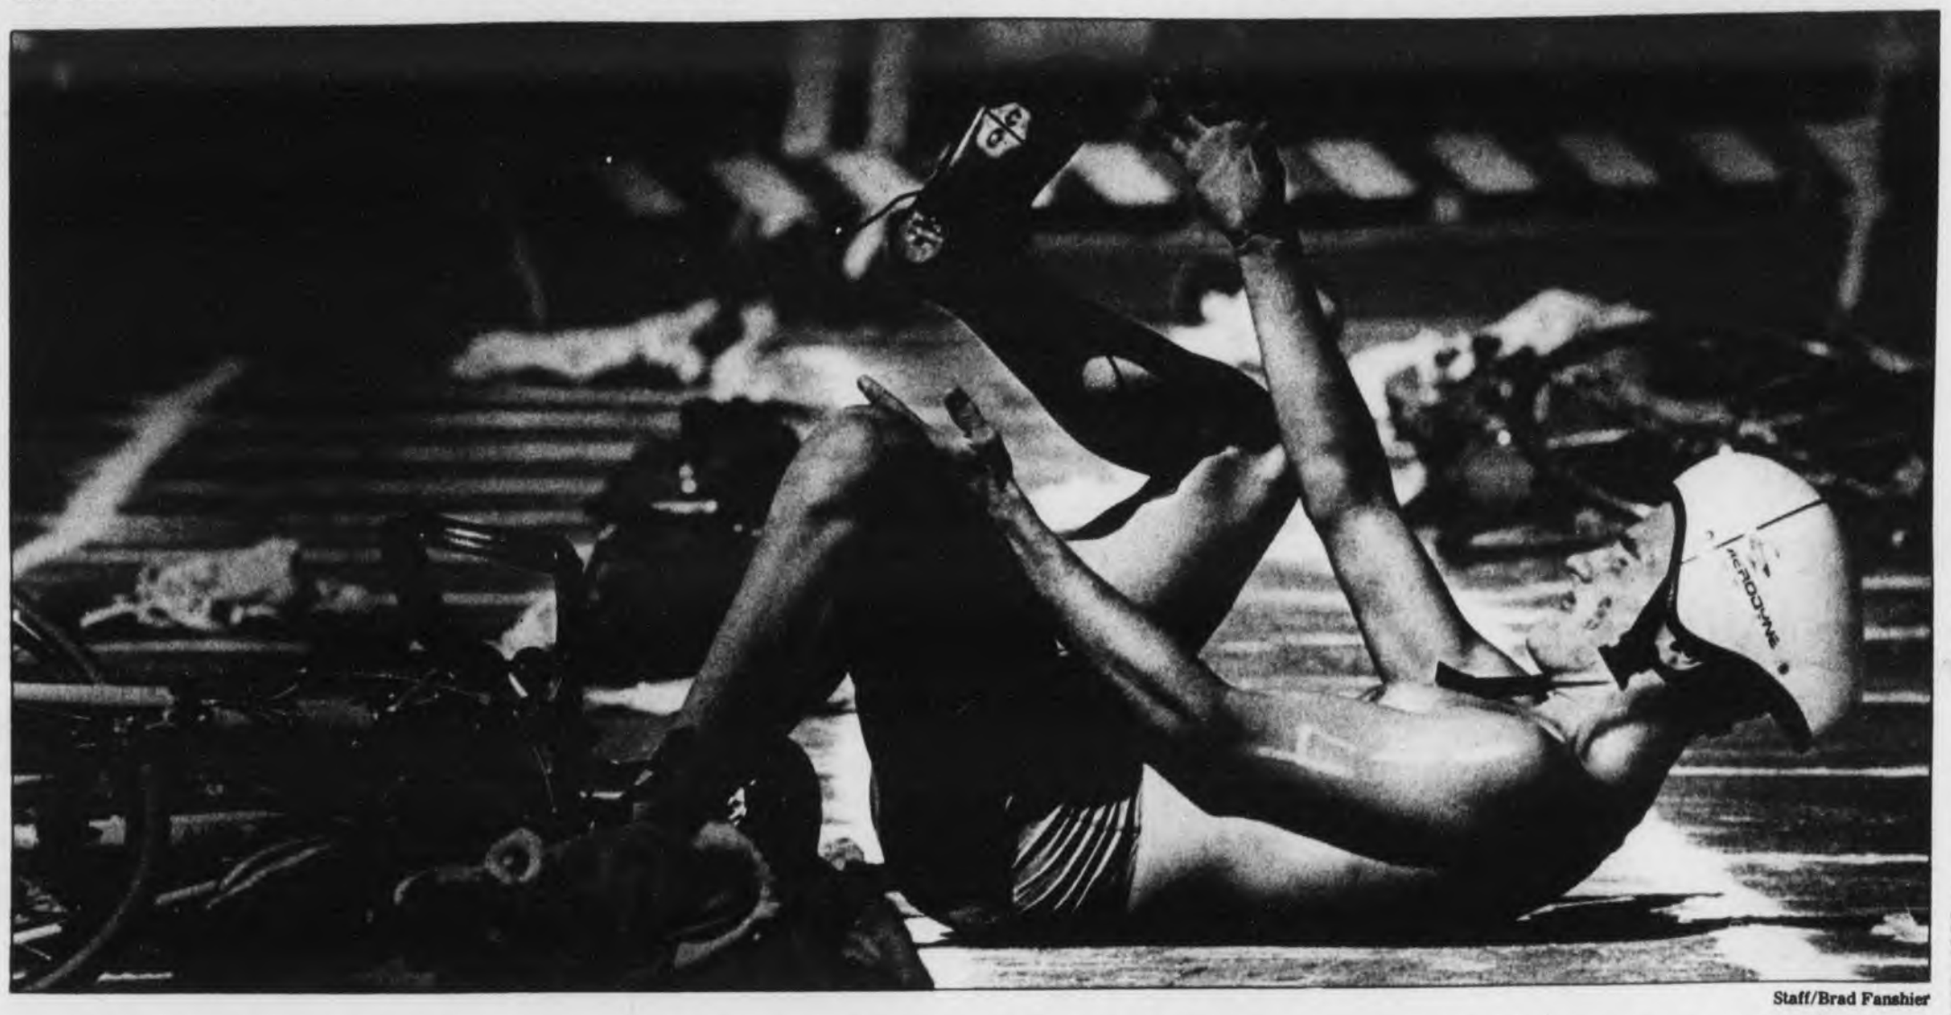
"I participated in the 1984 triathlon, but didn't fare too well," Johnson said. "Last year the event was full, so I really enjoyed Saturday's event. It was the first time I came across the finish line with a smile on my face."

Defending-champion Kirmse finished second in 58:37.50, compared to last year's winning time of 58:17.63. Michael York placed third in 58:52.45.

Kate Willcutts took the women's crown with a time of 1:07:30.69. Her time bettered Mary Ann Johnson's defending mark by more than a minute.

"I was in last year's triathlon and enjoyed it," Willcutts said. "I think I am addicted to this sport."

Geraldine Reed and Shanna Kelley finished second and third in the women's overall competition with times of 1:10:35.47 and 1:10:43.69, respectively.



Overall team champions were Larry Moeller, Dan McAnarney and John Fleming, finishing in 54:49.34. The defending champions smashed last year's mark of 56:17.59. Each member of a team competes in one of the race's three events.

The champions, along with the second-place finishers Ralph Carr, Lee Wages and Pat Perry (57:08.16), competed in the 100 years and over (accumulative age of the three team members) division, while the third-place team of Martin Dannatt, Robert Wilkerson and Mark McIntire (1:01:52.95) competed in the under-100 division.

One area Halverson said she would like to see improved at future Little Apple Triathalons is the traffic problem at the state park during the races.

In addition to the 250 competitors, there were 150 volunteers for the triathlon, which she said gives an idea of how many people it requires to assure the safety of the participants.

"What would really be super is to close down the park for two hours and run the thing," Halverson said.

Netters split dual matches

The women fell to Central (Okla.) State 6-3 on Saturday and defeated Oral Roberts 7-2 Sunday.

Kristy Line, playing at the No. 3 spot and Annika Emtell, No. 4, posted two victories in the weekend's action. No. 1 player Lena Svensson defeated Erin McCandlish of Oral Roberts 6-1, 6-3.

Coach Steve Bietau said he was disappointed with the women's play against Central State, but liked the way the team rebounded against Oral Roberts.

"We were very flat against Central State," Bietau said. "We played with a lot more intensity against ORU. Last year they beat us 7-2. So, obviously, I am very pleased with the win."

Next action for the women will be the KSU Fall Invitational Sept. 26-27 at the Washburn courts.

Soccer team downs KU 3-1

The K-State Soccer Club opened the fall campaign with a 3-1 victory over arch-rival University of Kansas on Saturday.

Senior Mark Reutha booted the first two Wildcat goals, while David Wietz added the final tally on the afternoon.

Big Eight suffers through long day

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Oklahoma and Nebraska had the day off, so all the redness in the Big Eight was spread across the embarrassed faces of players, coaches and fans.

The final score was Outside Competition 5, Big Eight one. Missouri, beginning its season at home with a 24-10 victory over winless Utah State, represented the conference's lone victory.

Including K-State's loss, the rest of the picture for old-time followers of the once-mighty Big Eight is not pretty. Colorado and Oklahoma State, preseason picks to fill out the league's upper division, lost to Oregon and Tulsa, respectively. Iowa State, which many felt could be greatly improved, is 0-1 after a 43-7 crushing by Iowa.

North Carolina did Kansas the favor of leaving its best running back home for disciplinary reasons. But it was the Jayhawks who were in need of offense as the Tar Heels posted a 20-0 victory to make Bob Valesente 0-1 as a head coach.

But is there another good team in the Big Eight? The early returns indicate there may not be.

Colorado dropped to 0-2 when Oregon scored nine points in the final 44 seconds for a 32-30 victory. Oklahoma State is 1-1 after getting whipped up and down the field by Tulsa Saturday, 27-23.

Seahawks frustrate Kansas City, 23-17

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Ken Easley set up a crucial third-quarter touchdown with a pass interception and Norm Johnson kicked field goals of 53, 35 and 34 yards Sunday as the Seattle Seahawks beat Kansas City 23-17 in the NFL's second regular season game.

The Chiefs scored a touchdown with four seconds left on Jeff Smith's 1-yard run.

With the Seahawks in front 16-10 in the battle between the two American Football Conference rivals, Easley picked off a Todd Blackledge pass on the Kansas City 29-yard line and brought it back 24 yards to the Chiefs' 5.

Seattle, 2-0, scored its second touchdown of the day three plays later on Curt Warner's 1-yard leap.

The Seahawks' other points came on a 6-yard touchdown pass from Dave Krieg to Daryl Turner in the second quarter.

Kansas City, 1-1, burned the Seahawks' secondary with a 70-yard touchdown pass from Blackledge to Carlos Carson in the third quarter to cut a 13-3 halftime deficit to 13-10 with only 5:37 gone in the second half.

Seattle got all its first-half points in the second quarter. Johnson booted his field goals of 35 and 34 yards in the second quarter before the Seahawks scored a touchdown.

K-State harriers nab first, second at Columbia

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

The K-State men's and women's cross country teams showed Coach John Capriotti and the rest of the Big Eight just how much depth they possess with impressive first- and second-place finishes, respectively, in the Missouri Invitational Saturday afternoon in Columbia.

Led by Ron Stahl's first-place finish, the men's squad captured top honors. Stahl completed the course in 25 minutes, 20.4 seconds. The women's team was led by Angie Barry and Alysun Deckert. Barry captured fifth-place honors, while Deckert was right behind in sixth place.

Capriotti said he was "very excited" about the performances of his young runners, especially the freshmen. He said he believes they will be a force to be reckoned with this season.

"I was very excited about their performance," Capriotti said. "We're a pretty young crew, yet I felt we competed well as we were up against top runners from Purdue, Michigan and Arkansas."

Overall, Capriotti said he was pleased with the women's performance. Sitting at home were Jacque Struckhoff, Anne Stadler, Betsy Silzer and newcomer Anneli Edling. The women placed second behind top-10 powerhouse Arkansas.

"When you leave four All-Americans at home, your chances of being in the lead are not as good," Capriotti said. "Yet, the women demonstrated their competitive edge in their second-place finish."

The women's squad also was paced by Nancy Hoffman and Lisa Wakem.

For the men, sophomores Rob Hayes and Pat Hessini "did an excellent job," Capriotti said. Freshman runners Rodney Murrow, Matt Vavala and David Warders also ran up to Capriotti's expectations.

Next week both teams will be traveling to Lawrence for the KU Invitational. Again, Capriotti intends to have both teams primarily made up of freshmen. He will not be taking any of his regular runners, but still believes the teams will be close to full strength, he said.

"This is another low-key meet and I'm not too concerned," Capriotti said. "We're looking ahead to do well at home (in the KSU Open on Sept. 27). We will run some of our top runners in that meet."

Gene Bartow at the University of North Carolina-Charlotte. Bartow also needs no evidence a visible basketball program can boost a school's enrollment.

After starting a solid program at Charlotte in 1970 — spending time toward the top of the national rankings throughout the 70s — and building respectability the following years on the hardwood, UNCC's enrollment swelled from 9,000 in 1979 to 15,000 in 1985.

Naturally, the only changes at UNCC didn't come in the basketball program. Instead, the basketball team's step up to the "NCAA big time" was part of an entire university improvement plan.

Wefald intends on implementing a plan for K-State that will impact the University's growth similar to what occurred at UNCC.

"We didn't have a marketing strategy for recruiting (when I came to K-State)," Wefald said.

And Travis is set to fulfill his role in Wefald's strategy by fielding winning teams.

"It takes a joint effort (between academics and athletics)," Travis said. "Our athletic programs have to be good.

"(Winning) is a very positive thing. If you are losing all the time, it pulls (the student body and alumni) apart."

And he knew it was for the best when Welch took his place behind the center.

"I'm all for whatever it takes for us to win," Williams said. "I think John is a good quarterback. If I'm having problems, (the coach should) put John in."

Northern Iowa switched defensive schemes at will, much to the bewilderment of Williams and Welch. The Panther blitz led to constant pressure on the Wildcat quarterbacks.

While the disinterested student body and the K-State Marching Band jammed to The Beatles' classic, "Twist and Shout," Williams and Welch twisted and tumbled on the turf of KSU Stadium in the arms of Panther defenders.

"Randy was getting pressure from somewhere," guard Bob Bessert said. "That's our (lineman's) big burden. We can't let him get the pressure. When he does it falls on our shoulders."

Bessert refused to get down on the team's quarterbacks — he knows K-State has another game next weekend at Texas Christian.

"As a team we want a victory," he said. "When we saw John come in, we said 'hey, let's protect him.' I have confidence in both of them."

Emergency phones see little use

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

Many students are faced with parking in a distant lot sometime during their college careers. When it is late at night and a student is alone, this can be an uncomfortable situation.

There is a resource one can use to help relieve some of the uneasiness — the campus emergency phones.

The phones were placed at various campus locations with the intent to be used if a person is ever in an uncomfortable situation.

"The phones are marked 'EMERGENCY' which is probably a misnomer," Beckom said. "But we want to emphasize the fact that that is the place to go when there is an emergency.

"Anytime you feel uncomfortable in your surroundings or settings as far as your personal safety goes, that is an emergency."

Beckom said he feels that society needs to rearrange the thought process of analyzing what an emergency is.

"An emergency is before the event happens," he said. "It's no longer an emergency when you become the victim. It's too late. If you view it as a non-emergency, you may be talking yourself into being that victim quickly."

Beckom suggests that if it's late and a student feels unsafe parking the car in a distant lot, he should use the phone. He said he would rather have a student use the emergency phone than to violate one of the parking rules.

The police department would be "tickled to death" if more students would call when they felt uncomfortable about their situation, Beckom said.

A person does not have to talk on the phone. Just driving up to the phone and rolling down the window a little bit to knock the receiver off the hook will get a response.

If a student decides to call, he or she should tell the dispatcher what parking lot the car is in, where the student will be walking to and what kind of car the student drives. An officer will be sent to see that the student gets parked and to his or her destination.

It may take five to six minutes if the police are busy, but the student should remain in the car until they arrive.

Because of liability, it is the policy of the campus police that the officer cannot provide transportation from one location to another unless it is within reason and is necessary, Beckom said.

The officer can watch a student walk to his destination, if it would make him feel more comfortable. If they have time and the student does not object, the officers can get out of the patrol car and walk with the student.

The emergency phones cost in excess of $2,000 each. A special fee of $285 to $300 is paid each month because of the extra cost of having a direct line to the police department.

"They are very expensive," Beckom said. "But they are worth the expense if we save one individual or make them feel at ease."

The phones are used an estimated 50 times a year, which Beckom said is low. In several instances in past years, there would have been fewer incidents of lost property had the phones been used.

Top firms to display work, expose students to concepts

By The Collegian Staff

For the fifth consecutive year, the College of Architecture and Design will present a major series of architectural exhibits and presentations titled "Architecture from the Plains."

Mark Lapping, dean of the college, said six regional firms will present collections of drawings, models, photographs and other materials for display in September in the Architecture Department Gallery, Seaton 205.

Members of the participating firms will visit the University to discuss their buildings and the philosophies, concepts and design methods.

"It's really exciting to see the professionals get charged up about their work," Lapping said. "The firms get a great deal out of it."

The series' goal is to provide students with the opportunity to see some of the finest works in the country, Lapping said. "We want to expose our students to some fine firms in the region."

Slide-illustrated talks and the discussions which follow will be open to the public without charge.

The Pearce Corporation, St. Louis, will be the first firm to give its presentation at 8 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Big Eight Room. The exhibit will run today through Friday.

Students' dogged efforts raise cash

By The Collegian Staff

Some fund-raisers tend to be a little dull and dry, but the veterinary students' idea to raise money was anything but that.

About 25 students participated in a dog wash on Saturday to help raise money for the University's chapter of the American Animal Hospital Association.

"AHA is a group that formed to promote excellence in small animal sciences," said Jeff Isaacson, senior in veterinary medicine. "We hope to use some of the money to put on a computer seminar next year and bring in some speakers."

Jim Speer, junior in veterinary medicine, said some of the funds will go towards trips that AHA sponsors.

"We go to different veterinarians around the country and learn different vet practices," Speer said. "It's a really good learning experience."

The dog wash was held from 9 a.m. until 3 p.m. at Westloop Shopping Center. Dillon Store Co. provided the lot, electricity and water for the fund-raiser.

"We had cars lined up at nine this morning," Speer said. By mid-afternoon, the students had bathed about 30 dogs and received a few showers themselves. Though it was work, they all seemed to find time to have some fun with the project, too.

All in all, the students had a perfect day for the dogwash — no mad dogs and beautiful weather. Speer said he believed the fund-raiser proved to be enough of a success that AHA will try to hold another dog wash in the spring.

and convention centers would open in Kansas, providing additional employment and tax revenues if the amendment passed, Carlin said.

"We're not just talking about drinking, we're talking about access to quality for those who simply want a better place in which to eat," Carlin said. "If we were to pass liquor-by-the-drink, one chain has indicated it would build three to nine new restaurants...where families can dine without having to pay a club fee to do it."

Taylor said establishments are in favor of liquor-by-the-drink.

"If it's only a matter of getting rid of the private club card...if that's all it would do, I'd be so glad," Taylor said. "Alcoholism is slavery to alcohol. The new pro-slavery crowd are those who want to get rich selling liquor."

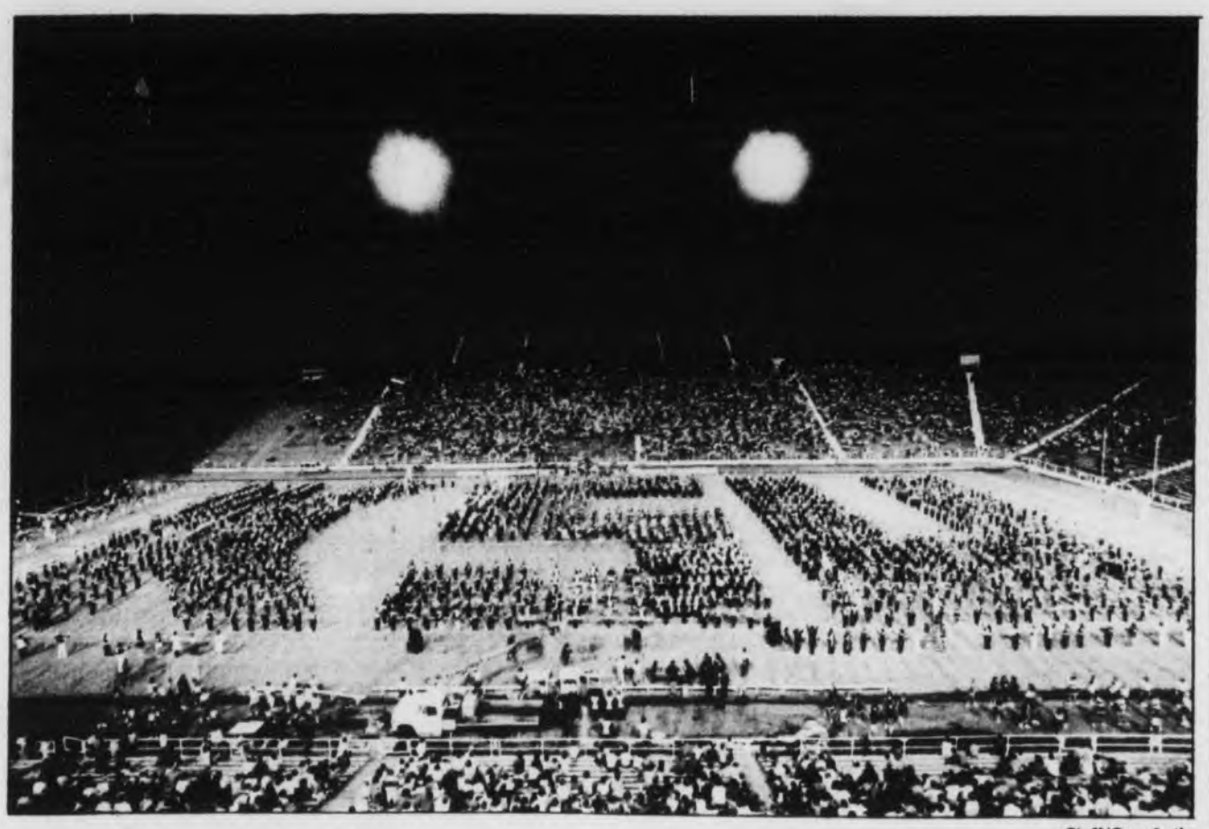
students," Finck said.

Wefald invited them to become members of the "superb K-State Marching Band" and also to consider the University and its program offerings.

"I looked forward to playing with the other bands and playing on the K-State football field," said Rashelle Taylor, a member of the Manhattan High School marching band.

The halftime show began with the band forming the letters "KSU" while playing "Wildcat Victory."



"Band Day is a box of crayons; it's lots and lots of school colors all packed into the stadium," said Steve Warren, junior in electrical engineering and a K-State band member.

Other songs performed were "Say You, Say Me," the theme from "Miami Vice" and "1812 Overture."

Finck said there are several benefits to hosting the Band Day, including service as a public relations opportunity for K-State recruiters. K-State Drum Major Julie Compon, senior in industrial engineering, agreed.

"I think this is a good recruiting tool, and they (visiting band members) get to come and play on a university field," Compton said.

"Band Day," Finck said, "gives an opportunity for the small bands to play in a large band. And for many, that is a thrill."

Reagan orders mandatory federal drug tests

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, unveiling his plan to attack drug abuse in America, ordered the executive branch Monday to set up mandatory tests for federal workers in sensitive jobs.

But Reagan's program drew immediate resistance from the American Civil Liberties Union and labor organizations representing federal employees.

In the Oval Office where he signed the order and put his name on letters to Congress accompanying a series of legislative proposals, Reagan said, "This is the federal government's way of just saying 'no' to drugs."

Reagan's move came one day after he and his wife, Nancy, made a nationally televised broadcast, appealing to people's consciences and their sense of patriotism, for help in waging war on drug abuse.

With the formal announcement of his anti drug-abuse plan, including Reagan's endorsement of capital punishment for certain drug-related offenses, the president joined members of Congress who have been scrambling to enact new measures of their own.

But beyond the consensus in official Washington that something must be done about the drug abuse problem, there were indications that some suggested solutions face heavy obstacles:

—Leaders of federal employee unions, and the American Civil Liberties Union, challenged the administration to define "sensitive" jobs.

Said Alan Adler, legislative counsel of the ACLU: "The president's proposal is a blatant violation of the rights of American workers to be free of search and seizure without probable cause."

—Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger spoke out vehemently against a proposal, included in legislation passed overwhelmingly by the House last Thursday, to require the president to dispatch U.S. military forces within 45 days to the nation's borders to interdict drug traffic.

—House Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, questioned the administration's commitment to putting enough money into the new anti-drug abuse campaign.

"The president said last night (Sunday) that you can't just throw money at the problem," Wright said. "That's true. You can't just throw words at the problem, either. You've got to have some money to do it right."

Reagan's executive order, requiring mandatory tests for federal workers in sensitive jobs and voluntary screening for the rest of the civilian federal workforce, took effect upon his signature.

"We're getting tough on drugs, and we mean business," Reagan said as Vice President George Bush looked over his shoulder.

"To those who are thinking of using drugs, we say: 'Stop.' And to those who are pushing drugs, we say: 'Beware,'" the president said.

White House counsel Peter Wallison, who briefed reporters on the president's program, said "there isn't a ballpark figure" for how many of the government's 2.8 million civilian employees would be affected by the mandatory testing.

Some published reports, however, have put the number as high as 1.1 million.

Under Reagan's order, those federal employees caught using drugs will be subject to penalties ranging from private reprimands to suspension. Federal employees in "sensitive positions," as defined by their agency heads, will not be permitted to remain on duty if they are found to use illegal drugs.

All employees found using drugs will be referred for counseling, treatment or rehabilitation, the order says.

One day after joining his wife, Nancy, in exhorting Americans to "rise up together in defiance against this cancer of drugs," Reagan proposed legislation and administrative steps that would add nearly $900 million in additional resources to combat drug abuse, bringing the cost of all federal anti-drug programs to $3.2 billion for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1.

Students 'roll on' to classes

By GREG BALES
Collegian Reporter

Clad in torn khaki shorts, a loose fitting shirt with palm tree print and a compact "Disc-man" playing Pink Floyd tunes, Dave Mayer, sophomore in general, has found getting to class by way of his skateboard a unique and enjoyable experience.

Mayer, who's never purchased a K-State parking permit, said he avoids a lot of hassles by not using the campus parking facilities.

"Sure, I'm still late (to classes)," he said. "But that's just my nature. I can't see paying $11 or $22 for a permit, and then not being guaranteed a space."

"Riding a skateboard is a lot of fun," he said. "I don't do any 'death leaps' or anything, and consequently my boards tend to last longer."

Even though he owns five boards, Mayer does have his favorites. Normally, he is seen on campus riding his 1985 JFA board. Although he doesn't know exactly what JFA stands for, he has heard rumors that it correlates with the punk rock band, "Jodie Foster's Army."

Mayer is particularly fond of his 1965 lightweight board which was handed down from his older brother.

"The board has very small and close wheels," he said. "And it's sure different to ride."

But Mayer hs had the time to practice on different boards. He began riding 15 years ago at the age of 5, and he's seen different makes and models come and go.

There are boards to fit all price ranges, he said.

"You can spend $40 to $80 on a department store model, like those at Wal-Mart and K-Mart," he said. "Or you can mail order boards from different companies, sometimes found in (skateboard) magazines. And those prices can go up to $150."

There's a wide variety of styles and designs available, he said. And the shapes of the boards are "endless."

Mayer suggests learning on the Cuba releases 111 political prisoners after 2-year talks

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — More than 100 released Cuban political prisoners, including some jailed since Fidel Castro seized power nearly 28 years ago, arrived in the United States today on a flight to freedom that followed two years of negotiations.

The 111 people, among them the nephew of a former president, made up one of the largest single groups of Cubans to arrive in the United States in years. Many seemed on the verge of tears as they went through the Miami International Airport terminal.

"I can say I'm in my country," said Rene Gonzalez Herrera, an elderly man in a wheelchair, after getting off the chartered plane. "I feel very happy after 28 years in prison."

Domingo Suarez Espinosa, whose 28-year imprisonment in a Havana prison ended just hours before the flight left Cuba, said it was hard to express the joy of being in the United States. He recalled sending his wife and two children away after Castro took over the island.

"I preferred never seeing them again rather than seeing them subjected to such a horrible system," he said.

Immigration officials had expected 117 people, 71 former or current prisoners, and the rest relatives, to arrive.

But one unidentifed prisoner died Monday in Havana and his wife elected to stay behind, said George Waldroup, a spokesman for the Immigration and Naturalization Service here.

Another person was kept behind because he was of military age, two people were inadvertently listed twice and one name was an erroneous entry, he said.

The plane took off from Havana about an hour late and arrived at Miami at 7:00 a.m., said Waldroup.

"Glory to God, thanks to God," said Nery Tejera, whose 44-year-old brother, Samuel Tejera Milian, was

Terrorist bombing injures 52 in Paris

By The Associated Press

PARIS — A bomb exploded at police headquarters in Paris Monday, and police said 52 people were injured, four of them seriously. The bombing was the fourth in a week in the capital and came one day after France announced a crackdown on terrorism.

The latest explosion, which demolished the hall where drivers' licenses are issued, happened about 1:50 p.m. on the ground floor of the police headquarters building on the Ile de la Cite, close to Notre Dame Cathedral.

"It was a very violent explosion," one police employee said. "Several persons were thrown several yards."

The bomb was planted despite strict security precautions, which are supposed to include a search by police of every handbag and briefcase brought into the building.

In Beirut, a French-speaking telephone caller took responsibility for the bombing on behalf of a group called the Committee of Solidarity for Arab and Middle East Political Prisoners. That name also was used in claims for last week's bombings.

Monday's caller told a Western news agency: "We will be thankful if you inform (French President Francois) Mitterrand and (Premier Jacques) Chirac that the next operation will be at the Elysee," the presidential palace.

Police said the police headquarters bomb appears to have been similar to those used in three other attacks since Sept. 8. Conflicting claims of responsibility for those bombings were issued in the names of two groups — the Committee of Solidarity for Arab and Middle East Political Prisoners and the Partisans of Rights and Freedom. French news reports say investigators believe they may be the same group.

Chirac had been about to announce his conservative government's new anti-terrorist steps on Sunday.

K-State Ambassadors cite experience, education from posts

By BETH HANNAM
Collegian Reporter

A year-long task is coming to an end for two University students.

Lori Shellenberger, junior in political science, and Terry Hallauer, senior in business marketing, will be stepping down from their posts as K-State Ambassadors to make way for the new ambassadors, whose names are to be announced Oct. 25.

Both said they look back on their experiences as ambassadors with fond memories and said the experience was fun as well as educational.

"It (the ambassadorship) has built up my confidence in my ability to meet and talk to all different types of people," Shellenberger said.

Hallauer said being an ambassador has helped him develop better interpersonal and time-management skills. It has also helped him better understand administrative procedures and channels, "what students can and can't do, and why," he said.

Although much of an ambassador's responsibility involves alumni relations, an ambassador must also recruit new students. Both said this was their favorite aspect of their assignments.

"Talking to students is the best part," Shellenberger said. "Sometimes you can tell when a student is riding the fence between KU and K-State, and you can see you are getting through to them and perhaps influencing their decision."

"It was a great opportunity for me to get one-on-one with students and really sell the University," Hallauer said.

Hallauer also said it was rewarding to get students to come to K-State and to know they will have a better start because of his contact with them.

In addition to recruitment counselor nights conducted across the state, the ambassadors spent about two nights a week attending alumni dinners and other functions.

"The alumni dinners give the alums a chance to talk with a current K-State student," Shellenberger said.

Hallauer said he really enjoyed meeting the University alumni, as well as working with all the college deans, President Jon Wefald and other faculty and staff.

"It is a very enriching experience," Shellenberger said.

"It's a great experience and a lot of fun," Hallauer said. "For anybody who enjoys meeting people and getting out and about, it's a great opportunity."

Applications for next year's All-University Ambassadors will be available Sept. 29 in Anderson 122. They will be due Oct. 9.

Reagan demands Daniloff's release

WASHINGTON — Showing increased impatience with the Kremlin, the Reagan administration Monday revamped the agenda for a meeting to plan a new U.S.-Soviet summit, pushing to the top of the list its demand for the outright release of American journalist Nicholas Daniloff.

White House chief of staff Donald Regan suggested that chances for a summit this year could be endangered unless Daniloff is allowed to come home.

Secretary of State George Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze are to confer in Washington on Friday and Saturday at what was to have been a meeting to fix the date and agenda for a summit.

Spokesman Larry Speakes said Shultz "will raise the issue as the first item on the agenda."

"I'm sure that preliminary discussions on U.S.-Soviet relations, which may include future meetings, will take place, but whether it will be resolved remains a question," Speakes said. "The change in the agenda is that Daniloff is first."

He left open the possibility the meeting would get bogged down on Daniloff and not make progress on a summit. "We'll start with Daniloff and see where it goes from there," he said.

Aquino seeks lenient credit terms

SAN FRANCISCO — Philippine President Corazon Aquino arrived in the United States on Monday for a nine-day visit to seek political and economic support for her faction-ridden government.

Aquino was greeted by Gov. George Deukmejian, U.S. Sen. Alan Cranston and a crowd of cheering supporters as she reached San Francisco on a regularly scheduled Philippine Airline flight. Air Force Two waited to take her to Washington.

In her homeland, military leaders pledged to keep the nation "stable and safe" in her absence.

Aquino, who will meet President Reagan and address a joint session of Congress this week, said before departure she would try to convince U.S. political and business leaders that Philippine problems are "as much their concern as ours."

Her visit includes meetings with officials of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to try to obtain more lenient terms on repaying the Philippines' $26 billion foreign debt.

Dole supports Rhenquist for post

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole declared his support Monday for William H. Rehnquist as the nation's next chief justice, dismissing criticisms of the nominee as groundless and often politically motivated.

"It is difficult to imagine anyone with a better set of credentials to be chief justice," Dole said in a floor statement as the Senate debated whether to confirm Rehnquist's nomination. A vote was tentatively scheduled for Tuesday, but was postponed until later in the week.

The Kansas Republican said Rehnquist had "simply the best" academic background and was one of the "most productive and prolific members" of the high court in writing opinions. Rehnquist has served as an associate justice since 1971.

"He has unequalled experience and he has the temperament and collegiality necessary to provide effective leadership on the court," Dole said.

Fellow Kansas Republican, Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, also intends to vote to confirm Rehnquist, according to her press secretary, Larry Shainman.

Book contains maps of missile sites

GREAT FALLS, Mont. — Mark Anderlik has just the thing for the politically minded tourist in Montana: a guide to the state's nuclear missile silos.

The $3 book contains maps, directions to each of the 200 missile sites and 20 launch-control centers in Montana, and descriptions of both the sites and the scenic and and recreational opportunities nearby.

"Our main goal with the guide is to show the people of Montana, as well as the United States and the world, where nuclear missiles are," Anderlik said Saturday.

"One look at the guide, and it's obvious that missiles are located in places with historical significance and great beauty," he said. "It's amazing..that there are people who live right next to silos and don't even realize it."

Anderlik, a Shelby farm hand, is coordinator of Silence One Silo. Members occasionally have been arrested in their campaign to shut down at least one nuclear missle silo permanently and to invite the Soviet Union to do the same, thus starting mutual disarmament.

Lightning causes power loss; electricity restored in 2 hours

By The Collegian Staff

A thunderstorm early Monday morning caused power losses in various parts of Manhattan.

The storm began at about 3 a.m. Monday morning and was over after less than an inch of rain fell.

There were five lightning-related power failures around the city, said John Johannes, district manager of Kansas Power & Light in Manhattan.

He said by KPL's standards, Monday's storm was "nothing to get too excited about."

"The lightning was so intense that people assumed we were having major problems," he said.

Johannes said no major damage was done. Because of the storm, 85 people were without electricity at some time, he said. The largest failure affected 30 customers and lasted 37 minutes. He said none of the power failures lasted for a long period of time, and all were repaired by 8 a.m.

The storm also had an effect on campus. The phone lines were down in several offices in Anderson, but were repaired by 10:30 a.m. Monday.

Patty Schurr, a receptionist in the controller's office, said the biggest problem this caused was that people trying to call in were not able to get through.

2. All students who are enrolled and attending classes during a regular semester or summer session who have paid health fees are eligible for care.
3. Those enrolled in Special Courses, for varying periods of time, who have made previous arrangements for health care coverage at Lafene are eligible for care. (Lists of these students must be furnished prior to being seen at Lafene.)
4. Only students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene; however, they must pay the spouse fee within 10 days of the time their own health fees are paid. (Children cannot be seen.)
5. Emergency care, prior to referral, will be given anyone who comes in.
6. Students enrolled in 6 hours or less, electing not to pay the health fee during the Fall or Spring semesters, who wish to be seen, will be charged $20 for each office visit. This charge continues until the full health fee has been exceeded, then that student will be afforded the same privileges as the regular fee paying student for the remainder of that semester.
7. Students who were enrolled in the Spring and pre-enrolled for the Fall semester but not attending summer school may pay $15 and be eligible for care during the summer. This fee may be paid within 30 days prior to summer registration and ends the day classes begin. A late fee of $20 will be accepted for the remainder of the summer.
8. Health fees are good until 12 o'clock the night the next semester begins.

NOTE: In addition to the above mentioned fees, there are minimal charges for certain supplies and services and the charges are subject to change without prior notice.

Extension Service waits on funds

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The Cooperative Extension Service is playing a waiting game.

Although the extension service's fiscal year already has begun, a federal budget that would give it at least a guide for incoming funding has not yet been approved.

The extension service is waiting for Congress to come up with a budget for the upcoming federal fiscal year, which begins Oct. 1.

Not only is the extension service waiting for a budget, it is also waiting to see if Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation will go into effect.

"Those are the two uncertainties: not knowing what your budget is and not knowing if Gramm-Rudman will go through," said Fred Sobering, director of the extension service.

The Supreme Court declared the automatic deficit reduction process of Gramm-Rudman unconstitutional. The process authorized automatic budget cutbacks if Congress did not devise a budget with less than a $144 billion deficit.

Currently, if the deficit should go above $144 billion, Gramm-Rudman only could go into effect with a joint resolution from Congress and the president.

"This type of situation leads to interesting management," Sobering said.

For the moment, the extension service has kept some positions vacant and has allocated minimum operating funds. These cutbacks all have been made in the six regional and state levels, Sobering said.

No vacancies have been deliberately made, he said. Occasionally, there is a vacancy because of the turnover in positions, but the positions are not being left open.

Kansas counties have taken some burden for the cutbacks, Sobering said, through experiencing a decrease in allocations that come from federal funds.

If Gramm-Rudman goes into effect, further reductions in operating expenses will be made, and the state and area vacancies that now exist will remain frozen, Sobering said.

"There are not many alternatives left for us," Sobering said. "It is like a cut in a person's paycheck. You still have to pay the essential expenses to keep operating, and the extras have to be reduced or eliminated."

The cuts that are generated, if Gramm-Rudman goes through, will come out of federal and state monies.

"I have a commitment to the counties. There should be no further impact on them," Sobering said.

Feds may ignore plea accord

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger, differing with the Justice Department, suggested Monday the government might not honor a plea bargain agreement with admitted spy John A. Walker.

"If John Walker shows deception in all of his disclosures that he has agreed to make, that would end the transaction," Weinberger said in an interview with The Associated Press and other news agencies. "...If he violates that at any time, why that agreement is off and we're back to the fullest possible punishment that can be administered."

Weinberger's comments were surprising, because the Justice Department, through spokesman John Russell, said last week that Walker's plea bargain would be heeded by the government. Federal law enforcement officials said last week that recent lie-detector tests suggested he was lying about certain parts of the espionage case.

Russell said Monday he would not discuss Weinberger's remarks but that he stood by his earlier statement.

The government has accused Walker of overseeing one of the most damaging espionage campaigns ever conducted against the United States, supplying Navy secrets to the Soviet Union for almost two decades.

If the government asked a judge to set aside the plea bargain agreement and the judge agreed to, Walker would be put on trial. Walker agreed to plead guilty to espionage charges in return for assurances the government would request a life sentence for him and a lesser, 25-year sentence for his son, Navy Seaman Michael L. Walker. His sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 3.

A life sentence for Walker would contrast sharply with the sentence recently handed down to Jerry Whitworth, a close friend of John Walker's and a leading figure in the spy ring. Whitworth was sentenced to 365 years in prison.

Accounting teacher dies of cancer

By The Collegian Staff

Sister Mary Strecker, 53, a former associate professor of accounting, died Friday at Carondelet Manor Nursing Home, Kansas City, Mo. She had been residing there while receiving treatment for cancer.

Sister Strecker is survived by her parents, Edmund and Aurelia Strecker of 1430 McCain Lane, Manhattan; and a brother, Joseph L. Strecker, of Wichita.

Born March 15, 1933 in Kansas City, Mo., Sister Strecker graduated from Redemptorist High School in 1950 and entered the Sister of St. Joseph of Carondelet, St. Louis Province, in 1951. During the 1950s she taught elementary school in St Louis and from 1960 to 1963 taught elementary and junior high school in Denver.

Sister Strecker received a bachelor's degree in business administration from Fontbonne College in St. Louis. She received a master's degree in business administration from Notre Dame University, a master's degree in accounting from The Wichita State University and a doctorate in accounting from the University of Missouri at Columbia.

Prior to joining the K-State faculty in 1978, Strecker taught accounting at the University of Wisconsin at Oshkosh from 1974 to 1978.

While at K-State, Sister Strecker was named outstanding teacher in business at K-State in 1979 and 1980 and received an award for excellence for teaching in 1982. Sister Strecker taught Cost Accounting, and Public and Governmental Accounting.

Sister Strecker was a member of the Beta Alpha Psi honor society, Beta Gamma Sigma accounting honor society, the Academy of Accounting Historians, the National Association of Accountants and the American Accounting Association.

Eugene Laughlin, professor of accounting, said Sister Strecker was "one of the very best (instructors) we had, good classroom performance. She was very interested in the progress of her students."

Pilots jumping plane depends on situation

As with all terrorist hijackings of commercial jetliners, questions remain concerning the takeover of Pan Am Flight 73 in Karachi, Pakistan. However, there is one question unique to this hijacking: should the flight's crew have abandoned the plane and its passengers through a door in the top of the cockpit?

Industry officials are considering that question and attempting to determine whether guidelines should be instituted stating under what conditions the crew may exit a plane that has been taken over by hijackers.

While there are definite opinions for each side of this issue, this problem should not be specifically addressed, primarily because the crew's proper course of action is contingent on each situation. It would be impossible to arrive at an all-inclusive plan.

Those in favor of the crew staying with the plane cite as their defense the age-old advice that the captain always goes down with the ship.

The exit of the plane's crew placed passengers and flight attendants in jeopardy and may have prompted the Karachi hijackers to open fire on the passengers because a new crew could not be delivered to the idle airliner.

Also, a compromise could not have been reached because there was no longer anything on board the hijackers wanted. The terrorists' already desperate situation was made more desperate by the lack of a bargaining chip.

Those in favor of the crew exiting the craft believe such an exit will prevent future hijackings because the terrorists will know their attempted takeover may be thwarted. It is, after all, difficult to hijack a plane that is grounded.

No matter what the consensus, written guidelines would never work because each situation is different, and the actions of a crew in a particular situation are impossible to predict.

Besides, it would be inadvisable to give terrorists something for which they can plan.

Important issues lost behind war on drugs

The newest push from the White House is drug enforcement.

Since President Reagan's speech Sunday night much has been said about the problem of drug abuse. Reagan believes drugs can be stopped by using mandatory drug testing of government employees and heavy fines for those involved in trafficking and use of drugs.

Reagan covered all his bases by picking a popular topic. Both parties have shown concern in the polls about drugs. Making an issue of social reform is a way of diverting public attention from real issues like tax reform and international events.

Aside from choosing a popular topic, Reagan is going the wrong direction with his proposal of an extra $900 million to fight drug abuse. The problems of drugs entering the country are immense, but as long as there is a demand there will always be a supply. The problem lies elsewhere.

Reagan plans to allocate $200 million to education and drug abuse treatment — not enough to go around. K-State's Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service is in desperate need of funding. Without it, the threats of the program closing could become reality.

Drug abuse can be ended by correcting the problem before it begins. New allocations are necessary, but the money is not planned for the right places.

Legislators must fund programs for wildlife

While Congress considers special interests in tax reform and budget cuts, one important group remains left in the cold — endangered and threatened species.

Legislators may believe this issue is trivial, yet the survival of wildlife is an important topic to mankind.

A bill to renew the Endangered Species Act, which protects wildlife from poaching and other environmental hazards, was passed by the House of Representatives last year, but it has been held up in the Senate.

The bill may not come up during this session due to the lack of a time limit for floor action. A threatened filibuster may force Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, R-Kan., to hold the bill.

The act, originally passed in 1973, was designed to create a program to conserve plant and animal species that are either endangered, in danger of becoming extinct, or threatened.

Conservationists have said the endangered species smuggling industry has nearly the same profit margin as the drug trade industry. Smugglers of endangered animals and exotic plants make such a good profit shipments that some species are driven to near-extinction.

An undercover investigation by the Justice Department and the Fish and Wildlife Service has resulted in 61 convictions during the last five years. Yet much remains to be done to ensure the survival of these species.

The Senate has overlooked the importance of wildlife in its budget. Perhaps they need to be reminded of the beauty of wildlife and the importance for endangered species to repopulate.

While the issue of endangered and threatened species may seem trivial, their survival depends on the Senate's action now.

U.S., Soviets should establish trust

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

"My business is war. All I know is war. And I'm here to tell you, after my war experience, that war is a very dumb way to settle differences among nations. And nuclear war is utterly insane," Rear Admiral Gene LaRocque, director of the Center for Defense Information, told a group of students earlier this year at a forum in Washington, D.C. — and few would dispute his remark.

This shared belief of people all over the world, and especially among the leaders of the United States and Soviet Union, is what has brought East and West together to settle their disputes through dialogue and to eradicate the prospects of the "utterly insane." The results of such dialogue have been several arms control treaties and other agreements, including cultural exchanges.

The success of U.S.-Soviet relations, however, has been plagued by the unfortunate reality that a fundamental necessity to permanent peaceful coexistence is missing in our relationship — trust. While both sides know it would be in their mutual interests to put their nation's resources into areas other than military, each is suspicious the other would take advantage of such action.

The United States, especially the Reagan administration, believes the Soviets have already been taking advantage of such situations. President Reagan has repeatedly charged the Soviet Union with flagrantly violating a number of arms control treaties, among them the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty and the unratified SALT II treaty — treaties the president insists we have adhered to, but the Soviets claim we have violated. As a result, Reagan has announced he will know longer comply with the agreements of SALT II.

On the same note, the American public sees an untrustworthy Soviet Union that invades its neighbors, imprisons political dissidents, supplies terrorists, shoots down civilian airliners and, most recently, frames U.S. citizens on spy charges, as in the case of journalist Nicholas Daniloff.

The Soviets are also distrustful of their adversaries, and they demonstrate that feeling vividly to the visitors of their country. For example, they won't allow picture-taking at airports and railway stations. As the former director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency Paul Warnke explained, "They feel that they are a beleaguered nation in a hostile world. You can say that's paranoia, but it happens to be a fact. They don't have any friends. They know that all of the nuclear weapons, except their own, are pointed at them."

If the Soviets remain in their shell of paranoia and continue their reputation as a distrustful client of arms control and other peace initiatives, then it is, in essence, worthless to enter further treaties with them. We can still hold summits, discuss arms control and conduct cultural exchanges, but any treaties made without a foundation of trust are simply ill-fated and not in the interest of the United States or world peace.

The threat of nuclear war and the level of devastation it would cause have made the necessity of building trust between our two countries seem insignificant. But treaties made without trust will only delay an inevitable war, while treaties made with trust will eliminate the inevitable.

Warnke further illustrated the reason we need a trusting relationship when he stated, "The fact is we're going to have to live with nuclear weapons...They have been invented and they can't be disinvented."

Living with nuclear weapons will be possible if we have a mutually trusting relationship with the Soviet Union, and it doesn't really sound so bad when you consider the alternative is dying with these weapons.

Building this trust will have to start from an American initiative to decrease public rhetoric criticizing the Soviet's failures. Since Mikhail Gorbachev became general secretary of the Soviet Union, Reagan has quieted his verbal attacks on the Soviets and has brought new light to the prospects of better relations. If this is to continue, Reagan and Gorbachev will have to open their doors to each other in an effort to establish a long-awaited trusting relationship.

U.S. defends freedom

Editor,

Re: Kirk Caraway's column "U.S. tyranny apparent in Vietnam" in Monday's Collegian.

Caraway's scathing indictment of U.S. policy in Vietnam reflects the "selective morality" of many on campus who refuse to see evil in any anti-U.S. governments.

More than 55,000 Americans and 1 million Vietnamese perished in the jungles and cities of Southeast Asia.

Why was the United States in Vietnam? Imperialistic aspirations? Oil companies? Showing muscle to the Soviets? Or was it because we sought to assist the Vietnamese in their legitimate struggle for freedom?

In rare agreement with President Reagan, I submit that our cause in the Vietnamese conflict was "noble." Our methods, in retrospect, were illogical, inhuman and totally deficient in understanding the warrior ethos in Ammanese history. However, the current government of Vietnam is far more oppressive than any U.S.-backed regime would have been.

I ask Caraway why hundreds of thousands have undertaken the treacherous flight from Vietnam in shanty boats and through hostile territory to reach the West? The communist government in Hanoi has imprisoned multitudes in laborious "re-education" camps, now known as the "Vietnamese Gulag." In fact, the forces of Ho Chi Mihn, "the Great Patriot," decimated the ranks of the National Liberation Front (Viet Cong) in suicidal attacks and outright blood purges. Many democratic nationalist and religious leaders were executed during and after the war. For example, in the 1968 TET offensive North Vietnamese troops occupied the ancient capital of Hue. Political opponents and "bourgeoisie" elements were eliminated, many buried alive in mass graves. "War is politics continued," as Lenin once said.

Vietnamese forces currently are perpetrating military action in Kampuchea, Laos, Thailand, and on occasion, China. The North Vietnamese army is estimated to be the third largest in the world. The Soviet navy has improved the massive U.S.-built port at Cam Rahn Bay, challenging our ability to protect sea lanes that provide Japan Persian Gulf oil. This is what we fought to prevent.

Certainly our policy toward Vietnam has lacked rationality and humane consideration. We should conduct our antipathy toward the Vietnamese government in a way that doesn't hurt the people there. Still we must encourage opposition to the bloody regime and learn from the past.

Those who criticize our policy in South Africa, Nicaragua and Chile must not neglect the victims in Ethiopia, Cuba, Afghanistan, etc.

Bennett makes point

Editor,

Last week, Secretary of Education William Bennett addressed an audience at K-State. I am appalled at the ho-hum reaction of many who heard that speech. Bennett made a profound public statement upholding the importance of teaching history, especially American history. Did anyone seriously consider why the secretary of education of one of the most powerful nations in the world would take the time to address such an issue? Is it possible students and faculty do not know enough details of history to grasp the political significance of Bennett's point?

Bennett's position is in direct opposition to the international powers currently influencing the American educational system. One such organization is the Aspen Institute. For years, the institute has had a commanding influence on educational groups such as textbook publishers, National Education Association and the National Council for Education. The primary goal of the Aspen Institute is the establishment of world order through global interdependence. Control of our educational system is just one means of achieving this power structure.

A brief review of history shows it was the Aspen Institute that prepared a political agenda for the Carter administration. In that agenda, the institute advised president-elect Jimmy Carter to create a separate Department of Education, which he did soon after taking office. It was the Aspen Institute that prepared the report titled, "A New Civic Literacy: American Education and Global Interdependence." In 1976, that report was submitted by Ward Morehouse to the National Commission on Coping with Interdependence. In that report the institute specifically called for a de-emphasis on the teaching of American history. This was considered critical to the long-range goals of the institute. A lack of historical values and identity among America's youth is necessary for the success of the desired world order.

I applaud Bennett for using his position to publicly counter and oppose such international factors, which are insidiously controlling our educational system. I am disappointed with the political ignorance and apathy of the "educated educators" of this University and this state. Bennett's position on the importance of teaching history may not have raised any eyebrows at K-State. But, I'm sure it has caused a stir within the national and international "think tanks" that are striving for political dominance in our world.

Now, I ask the reader: Is it really true that what you don't know won't hurt you? As for me, I will let history answer that.

Attack subdues Libya

Editor,

Re: The editorial "Libyan bombing fails to restrain terrorism" in Friday's Collegian.

The article denounces the Reagan administration's policy on terrorism as ineffectual and cites the recent Pan Am hijacking and Istanbul synagogue bombing as examples. Granted, the administration would like to see all senseless bloodshed eliminated, but its primary objective is the protection of American citizens.

One should note the immediate drastic decrease of violence incurred upon U.S. citizens following the Libyan raid. Prior to the air strikes on Benghazi and Tripoli, the Libyan government was openly bragging about the number of innocent lives claimed by terrorists they sponsor; yet directly after, it became evident that an American had been killed aboard the Pan Am flight, the Libyan state-run radio repeatedly denied any Libyan involvement. One might logically conclude the 180-degree reversal of their opinion on terroristic activities directed against the United States is a result of our retaliation with force.

Terrorism will continue as long as other countries continue to snivel and hide under their beds. An example is France, which suffered three major bombings in Paris last week, even though they refused to help the United States in its efforts against the Gadhafi regime and wouldn't let our aircraft fly over their airspace. Appeasement or ignoring the problem and hoping it will go away has never worked, and as soon as our "allies" realize this and join in a concerted effort to stop these butchering savages and those who sponsor them, the world will be a much safer place to live.

By SHERI DIRKS
Collegian Reporter

Home maintenance can range from jammed windows and electrical outlet adjustments to roof repair, house painting and yard cleanup.

For low-income homes, the elderly and the handicapped, these repairs can be costly and physically impossible, so the Homeowners Maintenance and Energy Program provides assistance.

"The University for Man is sort of the umbrella agency for the program, so it's a program out of the University," said Richard Friesen, half-time coordinator of the HOME Program since October 1985.

Client qualification guidelines for HOME were given to UFM by the city and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, he said.

"It's not really that often that the income guidelines actually come into play, because it seems that the program certainly comes almost self-selective and people who have better income don't bother to apply," Friesen said.

All the work is volunteer, he said, and there are many sources through which volunteers are organized.

Friesen said a lot of work is provided by community service workers who have been fined for driving under the influence of alcohol.

"Since the beginning of the calendar year there has been over 100 different people I've had contact with to do community service hours," he said. "So that's our big source of labor at this point."

The Community Work Experience Program assigned through the Social Rehabilitation Services is another group working with UFM.

Friesen said these people are in an alcohol abuse program, are unemployed and are required to complete an equivalent number of hours.

"We've got two guys working with us now who have quite a few skills for the program and are really helping us," Friesen said. "They work like three or four days a week."

Neighborhood groups also donate time to UFM. In April, the South Manhattan Neighborhood Association painted a house that hadn't been painted in years. The renter was physically unable, so SMNA identified it as a community project and UFM also committed some people, he said.

"The result of that is it makes them (the neighborhood) feel like they're making some improvements," Friesen said, "Usually, it's some things that are visible and encourages other people in the area to also make some improvements."

In January 1985, three fraternities, Beta Theta Pi, Sigma Chi and Phi Delta Theta, also conducted a door-to-door fund-raiser. Friesen said they're interested in any campus group which would like to help.

Other repair work, brought about through the downtown redevelopment area, is on brick sidewalks.

"Some of the areas that were going to become parking lots had brick sidewalks that were going to be torn up, so we asked the city if we could obtain the sidewalk brick and make that available to people who need repairs," he said.

To assist homeowners with repair costs, HOME has a revolving materials fund. He said they buy the materials and then ask homeowners to pay them back when possible.

They couldn't believe it!
They wouldn't believe it!
And then it happened...

Florida committee to nominate choice today

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

After interviews with five finalists, a search committee is scheduled to make a recommendation for a new athletic director to the University of Florida president today.

One of the five remaining finalists for the position being vacated by the retiring Bill Carr is K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis.

Travis said after he returned from two days of interviews at Gainesville in late August he was perfectly happy with his job as K-State's athletic director.

"I have not applied for the job and I'm not going to to do anything more than I've done...I like it here...and I'm not looking forward to leaving," Travis said.

"Florida is one of the top five (athletic) programs in the country and for me to be considered for the job was a real honor to me and what we're doing here at K-State," he said.

The Jacksonville Times-Union reported earlier that Travis was the leading candidate for the job, based upon the fact that he is the only candidate who is a Florida alumnus.

A local group headed by Bill Edison, president of Union National Bank and Trust Company, is not taking any chances. They are compiling an incentive package to encourage the athletic director to stay.

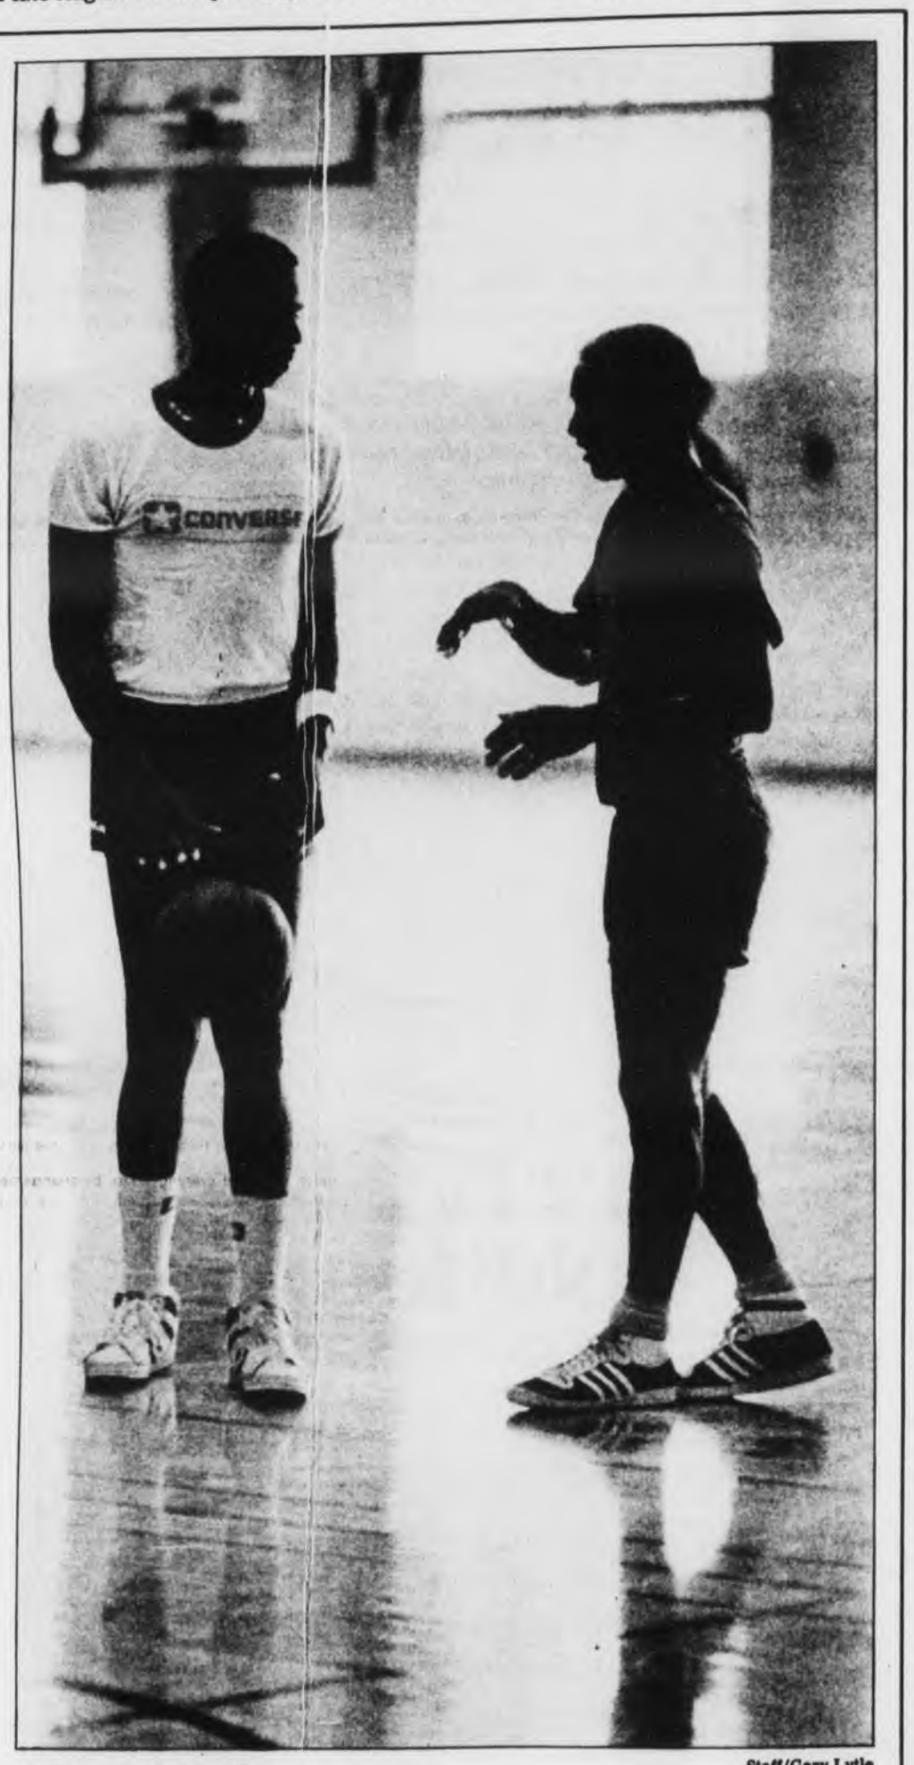
"Obviously we want Larry to stay, and we believe that in a couple more years, all of K-State's athletic programs could make a turn in the right direction," Edison said.

"We just think he's doing a good job, and we're trying to get him to stay," he said.

Edison said about "a dozen or so" local people have shown interest in the incentive package.

"We're still exploring some options — finding out what we can or cannot do (pertaining to National Collegiate Athletic Association rules)," Edison said.

Because of legal issues, Edison said he couldn't release any details as to what the incentive package might involve. The Manhattan Mercury reported in its Sept. 12 issue that "Edison admitted that he has between $10,000 to $15,000 in pledges," but Edison said Monday he did not make that statement.



"I think just the fact that some people are interested in him staying is a positive factor," Edison said.

Travis could not be reached for comment Monday, and a secretary at his office said Travis is not expected in until Wednesday.

Other finalists for the Florida job include athletic directors Richard Young of Washington State, David Wagner of Georgia Southern, Fred Grunninger of Rutgers and Cedric Warren Dempsey of the University of Arizona.

Travis was named K-State's athletic director in February 1985. He graduated from Florida in 1963 and received a master's degree there in 1969. Travis also was an All-Southeastern Conference guard for the Gators' football team in 1962.

Proposition 48 instigates questions about athletic, academic standards

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the second in a five-part series titled "College Athletics in America." The series will run throughout this week on the sports page.

The jury is still out on the National Collegiate Athletic Association's Proposition 48, but indications from administrators at K-State suggest some future revision in the controversial rule.

Proposition 48, a rule in its first year of enforcement, raises the academic standards under which high school athletes qualify for athletic finacial aid. Besides the 2.00 minimum grade point average previously required, high school athletes must now complete a core curriculum of college preperation courses and achieve minimum scores on either the ACT or SAT standardized tests.

The controversy concerning 48 concerns the use of the test scores as a measure for financial assistance.

Athletic Director Larry Travis appreciates the rule's intent, but has some reservations about the test score requirements of 48.

"I think there are some inherent problems with 48," Travis said. "The core curriculum is very good, but I think we're going to find out there is a problem with the test scores."

University President Jon Wefald shares many of Travis' beliefs on 48. Wefald is most pleased with the NCAA's effort to stress academics in an atmosphere where athletics is so often overemphasized.

"I think that it's a good thing that the NCAA put together a program which raises the expectations for young people. It's long overdue," Wefald said.

Veryl Switzer played football at K-State from 1951-53 and is currently the K-State's director of minority affairs. Switzer's thoughts on 48 are also positive, with the exception that standardized test scores have for years been under fire as being culturally biased.

"I support the idea of 48," Switzer said. "I'm opposed to the idea of standardized tests being used as a criteria for judgment.

"Studies have shown that standardized tests are culturally biased. The College Board has said it. These tests should not be used as a barrier (for students to receive athletic financial aid)," Switzer said.

"I think there will be a study done to find out where we stand — particularly with minority students," Travis said. "There could be some modification which I would be in favor of. They need to take a test to find out where they are academically, but don't make it a prerequisite to athletic aid," Travis said.

Wefald has some deeply ingrained problems with standardized tests being used as a barrier to any student.

"We overrate test scores," Wefald said. "Test scores are a snap shot of a person — it doesn't measure your ability to learn."

Wefald doesn't need to be told how vital it is to let a student develop his or her own potential.

"I wasn't a good student in high school," Wefald said. "People told me not to bother going to college. What (my high school grades) didn't measure was my determination."

Not giving anyone a chance bothers Wefald, especially when there is untapped potential lying dormant within the student.

"To some extent there is a cultural bias (in standardized test scores). Many of our minority students just need the chance to develop basic skills, so they can improve (from there)," Wefald said.

Switzer said the NCAA has a track record of approving rules and later discovering flaws with the rules. He points out the recent NCAA decisions about the Nebraska football team and the rules concerning the use of free passes given to student-athletes.

"The NCAA establishes a lot of rules they amend from year to year," Switzer said. "This rule (48) may be law now, but that does not mean it is ultimate."

Travis said the best remedy for the problems with 48 is the lessons the NCAA has learned from the rule's first year of existence and a little time.

"This is a transitional year. I think it will all be cleared up in the next six to eight months," Travis said.

MacDonald leaves team before UNI game

By The Collegian Staff

Starting noseguard Tim MacDonald has left K-State's football team for "personal reasons," head coach Stan Parrish announced Monday.

MacDonald didn't play in the 17-0 loss to Northern Iowa Saturday, and Parrish said MacDonald notified him of the decision to quit late Friday night.

Prior to 1986, MacDonald was a two-year starter at linebacker before the coaching staff placed him on the defensive line.

The Bishop Miege graduate and K-State junior offered no comment on his decision to leave.

"I have an explanation, but it's private," MacDonald said.

MacDonald had practiced all week, but missed a weekly team meeting at the K-State football office Friday night. The meetings take place every Friday night prior to all Wildcat games.

Parrish didn't offer any explanation for MacDonald's leaving.

"He told me he didn't want to play anymore," Parrish said.

Through the first two games, MacDonald had started both contests and had made a total of three tackles.

In his two seasons at linebacker, MacDonald totalled 121 tackles, two quarterback sacks and three batted passes.

Clark endeavors to transfer attitude to K-State baseball

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

Editor's note: This is the third in a series of stories featuring K-State athletic coaches. The series will appear Tuesdays on the sports page.

Mike Clark is a man with a task — to turn K-State's baseball program back in a winning direction.

The Coaches of K-State

"Baseball isn't a job," Clark said. "This is something I love doing."

Clark is hoping his attitude will carry over to the baseball team. The 'Cats turned in a disappointing 24-34 record last spring, which prompted the departure of Gary Vaught. He left to head Oral Roberts University's baseball program.

Clark said his players have already told him there is a difference in pressure they experienced last season under Vaught's direction and pressure they realize now.

"I'm kind of like a Dick Howser (Kansas City Royals manager) in games," Clark said. "Players should play the game; coaches do their thing in practice. The games should be enjoyable for everyone.

"When we have games, I just sit back and watch the kids play, making minor adjustments. As a team, we've got to have confidence and be together. The kids have enough pressure on them," he added.

Clark's relaxed coaching style has proven to be successful. In seven seasons as head coach at Northeastern Oklahoma A&M College, his teams compiled a 293-136 record. NEO had a 55-23 record last season.

"I needed a change," Clark said. "It took me three years to turn the program at NEO around. I stayed four more years, and I really couldn't do much more with it...I needed another challenge, and that's what this job is."

Clark said he is adjusting to K-State and is trying to mesh his style with that of his players.

"Basically, we're still playing with Coach Vaught's kids," Clark said. "He and I coach very differently, and the players have to adjust to myself and my staff.

"We're going to try to make them the best they can be. We'd like to get to the Big Eight tournament this year, and anything can happen once you get there."

Clark knows unknown variables, such as injuries, can throw off a program that has all of its goals based on win-loss records.

"I don't believe in win-loss type goals," he said. "We ask kids to give their best and play the way they've been coached to play."

Clark is also pleased with the "Total Person" program Athletic Director Larry Travis has installed at K-State. The "Total Person" program is aimed at helping Wildcat athletes deal with the pressures and problems of being a student/athlete.

Clark said athletics are keys which can open doors.

"One of the reasons I want to help kids with baseball is that it helped me to get a college education that I probably wouldn't have gotten," Clark said.

"I've had so many great experiences through athletics. I want these kids to feel these experiences and share them with their teammates," he added. "When you share in something, it's better."

Marketing of Wildcat athletics made easier with new coaches

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

K-State's athletic department has lined up an extensive array of promotional activities designed to market Wildcat sports.

Kenny Mossman, administrative assistant and director of marketing and promotions for the department, is in charge of creating and coordinating gimmicks and giveaways.

"A guy once told me," Mossman said, "that if you can market K-State, you can market anything. However, the ability to market this school took a 180-degree turn with the arrival of Athletic Director Larry Travis, football coach Stan Parrish and men's basketball coach Lon Kruger.

"I focus on promoting revenue sports. These include football and men's basketball. With the non-revenue sports, the coaches do their own promotions, and these minor sports usually have their own ring of boosters."

Football fans have already been treated to 10,000 "I'm a Stan Fan" buttons and 15,000 samples of Adidas, a new cologne.

Mossman said when K-State tackles Kansas Oct. 17, a pizza firm will give away 10,000 key chains, and a hamburger establishment will distribute 15,000 purple and white pompons during the Homecoming contest against Missouri Oct. 25.

> '...the ability to market this school took a 180-degree turn with the arrival of Athletic Director Larry Travis, football coach Stan Parrish and men's basketball coach Lon Kruger.'
> — Kenny Mossman

Also, a visor day is being planned tentatively for the Nov. 8 game against Oklahoma State.

The promotions for basketball season are still in the works, Mossman said. But, he and Kruger have planned a pep rally for Oct.14, and at 12:01 a.m. Oct. 15, "K-State's Midnight Madness" will be staged.

Oct. 15 is the first day National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball teams can practice. Just after midnight, Kruger's Wildcats will have their first practice while two local radio stations promote a dance and broadcast the event.

Mossman said the University of Kansas conducted a similar event last year which became known as "Late Night with Larry Brown."

A popular promotion during basketball season last year is being brought back. The Bud Lite Daredevils will perform at halftime of the Wichita State game Jan. 12. Mossman said they were brought back because their performance was "very well-received last season."

Mossman only handles promotions for the revenue sports, but that doesn't mean there are no other promotions. Baseball coach Mike Clark said he is trying to line up promotions which aren't centered around "freebies."

"We're trying to do something where if you come to the game, you get something like a restaurant discount," Clark said.

Extension director retires to build home, further education

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

After 30 years of extension work, Fred D. Sobering, associate dean of agriculture and director of the Kansas State University Cooperative Extension Service, has announced his retirement, effective March 31, 1987.

Sobering made this announcement in a letter to the faculty and staff on the Labor Day weekend. He said the retirement is effective March 31, but he will be in the office only until the end of 1986 because of accumulated leave.

Sobering said he is anxious to achieve some goals and career options in the private sector.

"I expect to look around at some potential business opportunities that are in the offering," Sobering said. "One of the goals I have had for years is to return to college and get a law degree."

He said he has not, as of yet, applied for admission to a law school.

"I don't know whether they will accept me or not, but that is one of the things I have been thinking about for some 20 years and this will give me the opportunity to follow through on that goal," he said.

Sobering and his wife, Esther, have purchased some rural property just east of Lake Perry on which they plan to build a house. He said they plan on doing most of the work on the house themselves because carpentry has always been one of his hobbies.

Another hobby Sobering said he enjoys is golf.

"I would like to see if I can get my golf handicap down to 12 again. I used to do a lot of golfing back in the '70s and have not done much of it since I became director of extension," Sobering said.

As director, he said he is responsible for administering programs, personnel and budgets for the entire cooperative extension service in the state of Kansas.

"Our function at the extension service is to provide informal education to the people in the fields, homes and communities across the state.

"We are a decision-making tool," Sobering said.

The personnel is composed of the 105 county extension offices, the five area offices in the state and the faculty on campus, Sobering said.

"There is a total of about 500 faculty and 300 support staff," he said. "I am also responsible for the $26 million budget which includes funds from federal, state and county sources.

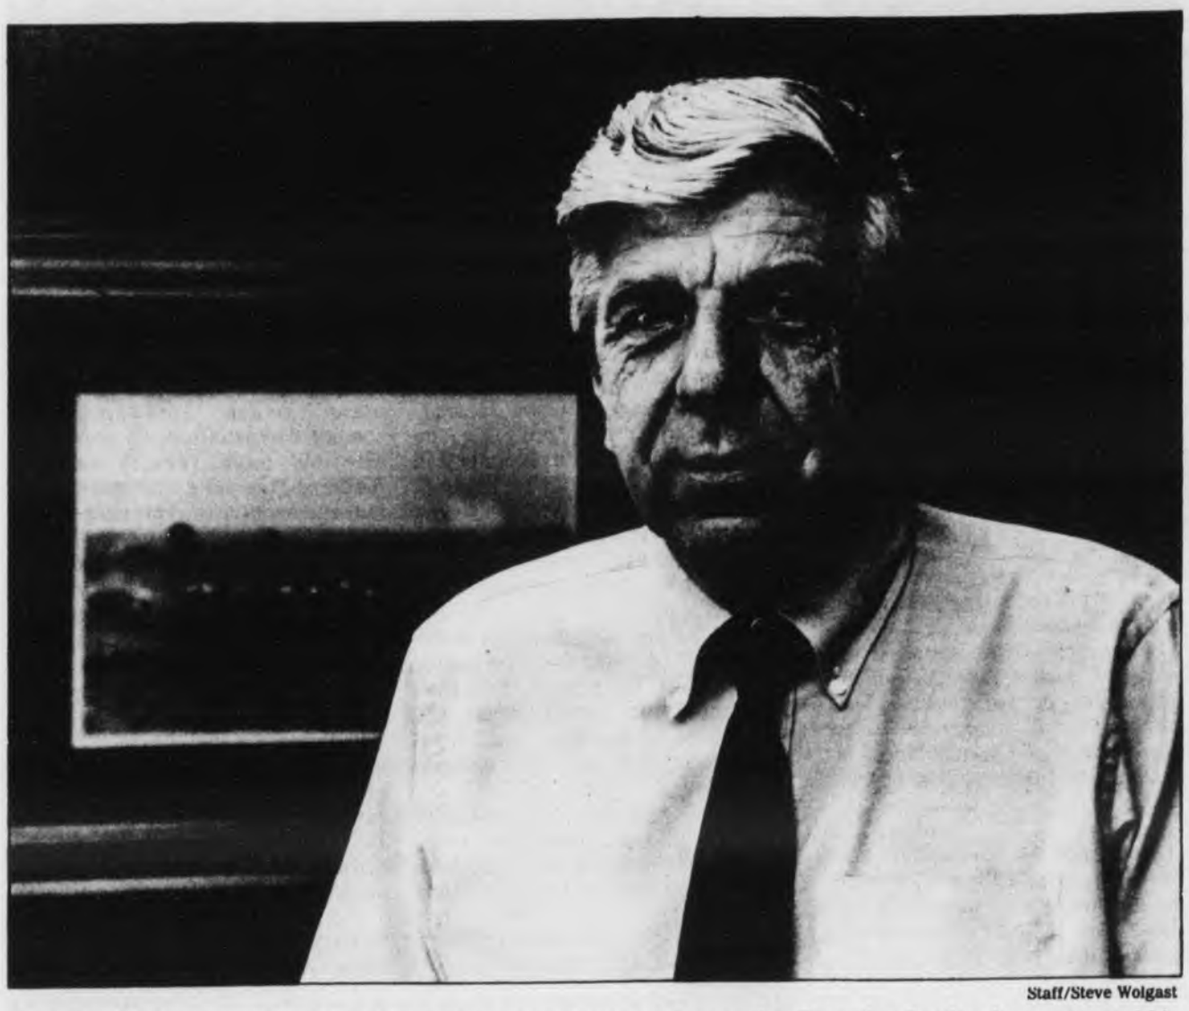
"This responsibility is delegated to other people, but in the final analysis, it is my responsibility," Sobering said.

The need for information is more critical now than it has ever been in the past, he said.

Sobering said he also believes the extension service system has a bright future.

"There is no doubt that we are operating under a lean budget situation, but if we can continue to adapt our educational programs to meet the needs of the people of the state, there will be an extension service for a long time to come," Sobering said.

"The most rewarding thing has been working with the thousands of people in North Carolina, North Dakota and Kansas, the three states I have had the opportunity to serve," he said. "Working with the people, providing the kind of information that will help them operate the farms and ranches more effectively, has been very rewarding."



Sobering said one of the most exciting things in the last couple of years at the extension service has been the advent of the new computer technology.

"This helps us increase our efficiency of the internal management and strengthens our educational programs," he said. "This plan will more effectively put a communications system between the counties and the state office."

Sobering said he hopes the Regents and Legislature will approve the satellite up-link facility, to be built on campus, which will be useful in expanding education outreach in the state.

Born and raised on a farm in Manitoba, Canada, Sobering received his undergraduate degree from the University of Manitoba in agriculture. He received his master's degree from North Dakota State University in 1963, and his doctorate in agriculture economics from Oklahoma State University in 1966.

Minister recalls Central American visit

By ANNE BRANDSBERG
Collegian Reporter

U.S. embassy personnel are the only people in Central America afraid of a Communist takeover, the Rev. Don Fallon, campus Lutheran minister said Monday night at the Manhattan Coalition on Central America rice and beans dinner.

In May, Fallon and a group of clergy and educators took a two week trip to Central America, visiting Honduras, Nicaragua and El Salvador.

Fallon stressed the differences in political tension in the three countries, Nicaragua being the least hostile.

"Going from Honduras to Nicaragua to El Salvador was like going from the frying pan into the fruit salad and back into the fire," Fallon said. "The level of U.S. military aid is the highest in El Salvador. That's where we saw the most military presence."

Fallon and the group visited several refugee camps housing people who have escaped war in their own country. In Honduras, one of the refugee camps held those fleeing from Nicaragua after being accused of siding with the U.S.-backed contra army.

Throughout the area, Fallon said, there was evidence that money sent for humanitarian aid is being diverted for military use by guerrilla soldiers to attack the Sandinista government across the Nicaraguan border.

"The military drains off millions of dollars in aid and adds to the struggle," Fallon said. "All the people we talked to were critical and anxious about the U.S. military presence."

While staying in Nicaragua, Fallon's group talked to a Nicaraguan lawyer who works for the National Conservative Democratic party, one of six that participated in the national elections two years ago.

He told Fallon no Nicaraguans are scared of a Communist takeover. Fallon and his group were introduced to an international task force helping the Nicaraguan government form an economic system that provides for the poor and give incentive to farmers to produce subsistence crops for the people of Nicaragua instead of fruit for export. The Nicaraguan lawyer said no one in his country goes hungry anymore.

While talking to the poor peasants that sought refuge in the Nicaraguan capital, Fallon's group spoke with a church congregation. An older woman said the U.S. embassy calls the congregation a Communist group when they gather to pray for the "disappeared" and ask the government to give them back.

"The Sandinista government has stopped the torture of the enemies of the revolution, has stopped the death penalty and seems to care more for the handicapped and the poor than other governments," Fallon said.

A very poor refugee from El Salvador told Fallon what the contras had done to a friend, Silvia Mendez, who was working as a volunteer on a community project sponsored by the Sandinista government.

He said the contras blew up the building they were working on and the shrapnel cut off Mendez's legs, and as he lay there screaming in the street the contras disemboweled and castrated him.

One of the poorest refugees stopped Fallon before he left and said God would forgive President Reagan for he doesn't know what he's doing.

"The atmosphere there (in Central America) can be summed up by the T-shirt on a boy that simply said 'Stay Alive in '86'," Fallon said.

Human Ecology hires 3 professors

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This article is the seventh in a series on new administration.

Three new faculty join the College of Human Ecology this year.

Margaret Boschetti is a new associate professor in the Department of Clothing, Textiles and Interior Design. Before coming to K-State, she was an associate professor and coordinator in the department of clothing, textiles and design at the University of Nebraska. Boschetti's area of expertise lies in interior design for the elderly.

Janice Huck is a new assistant professor of apparel design. Huck recently finished her Ph.D., here at K-State. Her area of expertise is in functional and protective clothing design.

New in the Department of Home Economics Extension is Kathryn Beckham. Beckham received her Ph.D. in child and family development from the University of Georgia. Beckham's expertise is in personnel development and stress management programs.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean of academic affairs of the College of Human Ecology, said the college has several new progams being implemented this year, also.

"This year we have our first freshman class enrolled in a new dual degree program of nutrition and exercise science. It's a program where students will be working in the area of human wellness."

"We are continuing to expand computer applications in many areas including computer-assisted design and we now have faculty in dietetics teaching compter management for food preparation," she said.

In the Department of Human Development and Family Studies, hearing-impaired children are becoming a part of student laboratories to provide a new experience for students, Moxley said.

"Other areas that the college is focusing on include research on rural families, how rural families are managing finances and how these families are interacting," she said.

Skate

less expensive models since some riders get discouraged and quit. He said he's tried different tricks, and will probably continue to do so.

But Mayer said he stresses safety.

"It is real important to know how to fall," he said.

The skateboard was invented in the late 1950s by southern California surfboarders seeking a diversion when there were no waves. Soon, "sidewalk surfing" became a hit, and skateboards were produced commercially.

In 1965, however, the media were flooded with stories about accidents and injuries sustained from the new fad. Combined with concern and antagonism from parents and police, skateboarding was banned in many places.

It wasn't until 1973 and the introduction of polyurethane wheels that skateboarding took on a revival. With the new high-traction wheels designed after those found on roller skates, skateboarding was ready for its second boom.

The popularity grew internationally. From California to Sweden, large parks equipped with ramps and pools were built. Skateboarding competitions were being conducted all over the world.

And again, the accidents increased.

Skateboarding turned quiet for a few years following the second swing of the popular fad. But there are those fans of the sport that believe skateboarding is on its way back again.

Sue Scheufler, junior in industrial engineering, said she thinks skateboarding is once again on the rise.

"I saw very few people riding my freshman year," she said. "But the numbers (of riders) have increased each year."

Brian Weaver, sophomore in electrical engineering, and friend and fellow riding buddy of Scheufler, agrees the number of riders has increased.

"On my way to classes, I've seen quite a few other riders this year," he said.

Both Scheufler and Weaver find skateboarding a great way to get to class — especially if they've overslept.

"I haven't run into anybody," Weaver said. "We want to be careful. We watch out."

Scheufler and Weaver still ride the original boards they have had since fourth and sixth grade, respectively. Scheufler's board, which is fluorescent yellow and decorated with an "I love K-State" bumper sticker, can be seen easily from a distance.

Weaver's skateboard isn't as noticeable, but he said he feels attached to it just the same. Weaver and Scheufler's color schemes may not go so well together, but the riders apparently do.

Last year, the two could be seen riding to classes together, going to the movies, or just "cruising" Aggieville. On Halloween the two dressed as Mickey and Minnie Mouse and skateboarded their way to Calculus 3.

"We're compatible skateboarders," Scheufler said. "Brian leads off with one foot, and I do with the other. Sometimes we'd skate with our arms around each other. It was really a lot of fun."

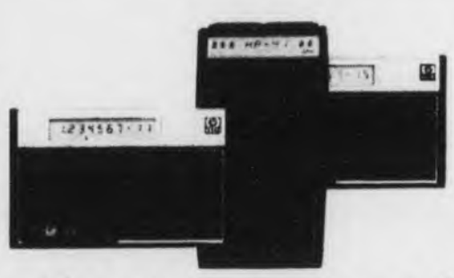
among those listed as being on the flight.

The Cuban government kept Tejera Milian behind bars for 18 years before his release in May, she said. His wife and young son are accompanying him, she said.

The permission for the emigres to leave Cuba came after two years of negotiations among the Cuban government, the White House and the Roman Catholic church.



The Reagan administration had long refused to take more Cuban refugees because Castro has refused to take back criminals who immigrated to Miami during the 1980 Mariel boatlift.

But three weeks ago, President Reagan announced that all Cuban political prisoners jailed for more than 10 years could seek entrance to the United States.

There were 71 former or current prisoners on the release list.

Most of the freed Cubans will settle in the Miami area, said George Lezcano, a spokesman for the Archdiocese of Miami.

Historic Wareham Theater closes

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

The end of Sunday's movie showings marked the closing of downtown Manhattan's Wareham Theater for an indefinite period, said Bob Howard, city manager for Commonwealth Theaters.

"The reason we're closing is because the quantity and quality of movie products available for that particular theater just haven't been good for some time," Howard said.

"Product availability from fall until Christmas is particularly slow, so that's why it was decided the theater should be shut down at this time," he said.

Whether or not the Wareham will be reopened at Christmas will depend on product availability, he said.

"At this time I don't know for sure if it will be reopened, but it looks more likely than not that the Wareham will be closed permanently as an exhibition movie theater," Howard said.

'...it looks more likely than not that the Wareham will be closed permanently as an exhibition movie theater.'
— Bob Howard

"We'll just look at what movie products are available for the theater later on and make a decison then," he said.

Howard said other factors are also figuring in the outcome of the theater.

"The Manhattan Arts Council has been looking at the building as a possible site for their projects and the Wareham family will also have a major input in what happens to the theater," he said. "Commonwealth's lease in the building expires in December 1987."

With the closing of the Wareham, there are two remaining theaters open in Manhattan under Commonwealth management: the Campus and the Westloop 6 Cinema theaters. Another Commonwealth theater, the Varsity, located in Aggieville, was closed at the beginning of the summer, Howard said.

"The Varsity was closed for similar reasons as the Wareham — there just wasn't much product availability for that theater," he said. "Right now, we've been working out a sort of preliminary program which would make the Varsity a specialty theater where foreign and other types of special films could be shown."

Howard said the plan for the Varsity is still in the decision-making process, but he has received good feedback on the idea.

The Wareham Theater itself has been under Commonwealth management for approximately 40 years.

"The building has been around since about 1910, when at that time it was probably a house stage for productions," Howard said.

S. African teams look for workers trapped in mine

By The Associated Press

EVANDER, South Africa — Welders accidentally ignited a fire in a mile-deep shaft of the Kinross gold mine Tuesday, and the flames and fumes killed at least 44 workers, injured 183 and trapped 154, officials said.

The state-run South African Broadcasting Corp. quoted Kobus Olivier, manager of the mine, as saying there was only a slight chance that the missing miners survived.

Dawie de Beer, a spokesman for General Mining Union Corp., South Africa's second-largest mining group, told reporters at the mine gate that 26 bodies were brought out of the mine shortly before midnight, about 14 hours after the fire broke out.

Eighteen bodies had been recovered earlier.

De Beer reported 154 miners were missing.

Spotlights illuminated the two pithead towers as search operations continued through the night. Ambulances and police cars were standing by.

Guards checked vehicles at the gate, but there was no gathering of relatives awaiting word about the fate of the missing men. Many black miners live in company hostels and cannot be joined by their families who remain in the black homelands or neighboring countries.

Olivier said 128 black workers and 55 whites were hospitalized in Evander, which is on the edge of the mine, most suffering from smoke inhalation. Five were reported in serious condition while the others were listed as satisfactory.

At least 13 of the dead miners were known to be blacks, but no information was available on the other 31 known to have died.

Earlier, the independent South African Press Association quoted a man at the scene as saying he had counted more than 100 bodies. The news agency did not identify the man and the report could not be confirmed.

It was the worst mining disaster since 1983, when 68 workers were killed in a methane gas explosion at the Hlobane coal mine.

More than 2,000 miners were brought safely out of the shafts, Olivier said, and 140 rescue workers were in the mine early today searching for survivors.

There was hope that some of the miners had avoided the deadly fumes by staying in pockets of untainted air.

Federal union files suit to block drug proposal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal employees' union filed suit Tuesday to block President Reagan's order instituting widespread drug tests for government workers, and the chairman of a House panel introduced legislation to override it.

The National Treasury Employees Union charged in its suit filed in U.S. District Court here that the executive order Reagan signed Monday establishing the test program violates the Constitution's Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable search and seizure.

The suit also charges that the executive order violates the Civil Service Reform Act in permitting agency heads to remove or discipline employees, including those in non-sensitive positions, who have been found to use illegal drugs.

In a request to Congress for amendments to the civil service law and another statute, the White House acknowledged that the courts may rule as illegal any disciplinary action taken under Reagan's directive.

"Parts of the executive order obviously cannot be put into effect until the enabling legislation is passed," Albert Brashear, a White House spokesman, said Tuesday.

In the package sent to Congress, Reagan asked for an amendment to the civil service law clarifying that it does not "permit or require the employment of an applicant or employee who uses illegal drugs."

"Absent this change," the White House said, "a drug-using employee might attempt to argue that his off-duty drug use has no nexus or relationship to the performance on the job."

The law, as interpreted by courts, now allows disciplinary action against civil service workers only "for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service."

Without a showing that drug use at home affects an employee's work, the union contended in its suit, disciplinary action is "prohibited personnel practice" under the current law.

Task force questions use, control of proposed athletic fee

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
and JEFF BIELSER
Staff Writers

Questions were raised for the first time by the Athletic Fee Task Force Tuesday night concerning how much control students would have over monies raised by a possible student athletic fee.

Task force members discussed ways to safeguard student input over the control of the money.

One consideration of the members was to use the money for non-revenue sports or to help subsidize scholarships for those sports.

"If we're going to be forced to support the athletic department, then we need some assurance on where the money is spent," said Kirk Caraway, task force member and senior in political science.

"I don't think it's right to dump the money in our laps (the athletic department); students need to be represented," said Mike Jones, business manager for the athletic department.

Jones is an ex-officio, non-voting member of the panel whose job is to provide the task force with information from the athletic department.

The task force began meeting three weeks ago. Its function, according to a student senate resolution, is "to research the feasibility of assessing students a non-incidental athletic fee to subsidize funding of the athletic department."

Doug Folk, task force chairman and junior in electrical engineering, said that in his view the committee is "an informational group."

"Our job is to get information to the people," he said. "If there is the slightest chance students want it (an athletic fee), then we need a proposal for an athletic fee."

Folk said the panel should "come up with a proposal people can vote on."

In a discussion of the 1986-87 budget for the athletic department, Jones told the group that the department was conservative in its budget forecasting to prevent problems that arose last year.

"You have to cut every place you can," Jones said. "Every sport was basically cut in some way."

He said even with the budget cutting, the department could still use the money generated by an athletic fee.

"If there's going to be a student fee, it should be because students want it — not because the athletic department wants it," he said.

Steve Ligon, task force member and senior in animal science and industry, said he hadn't determined whether there was a need for the fee.

"I'm just taking all the information in right now," he said. "I think it will be awhile before we get enough information to make a decision."

Work-study jobs remain available despite federal funding reductions

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Though cuts in federal funding may cause stiffer competition, campus jobs are still available, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

Federal funding cuts caused by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act have resulted in a reduction in the amount of Pell Grant dollars awarded, Viterna said. As a result, more students may be applying for work study and campus payroll jobs.

As of yet, however, there is no evidence of job shortages.

"We have jobs being called in every day for our job board in the Union," he said. "If students have not checked that, they may want to."

The work study and campus payroll programs are two kinds of employment the University offers undergraduate students to assist them in earning a portion of their education costs. The earnings are monitored by student financial assistance.

The only difference between the two job programs is the fund from which the students are getting paid, Viterna said.

While the work study program is based on a student's financial need, the campus payroll program is available to any student.

Although students may perform the same duties and receive the same wages for work study and campus payroll jobs, the cost to the employing departments varies.

Du Pont becomes first to declare '88 GOP presidential candidacy

By The Associated Press

WILMINGTON, Del. — Former Delaware Gov. Pete du Pont declared his presidential candidacy Tuesday, saying it was "time to get tough with drug users" and advocating mandatory drug testing of teen-agers in schools.

With a speech in the crowded ballroom of the Hotel Du Pont, the man who served eight years as Delaware's governor became the first formal entrant into the race for the 1988 Republican nomination to succeed President Reagan.

Several hundred supporters cheered and waved flags and banners.

After declaring his candidacy, du Pont flew to New Hampshire to campaign in the state which traditionally holds the nation's first presidential primary.

In Wilmington, a high school band played and cheerleaders bounced up and down when du Pont and his wife, Elise, entered the ballroom.

Potentially the most controversial part of his program was his proposal to press for mandatory drug testing of teen-age school children.

He said teen-agers should be told that if they failed to pass drug tests they would be barred from having driver's licenses.

Medicare patients face rising costs

WASHINGTON — The cost of the first day's stay in a hospital for Medicare patients will jump by 16 percent to $572 on Jan. 1, the government says.

That is $80 more than the $492 Medicare patients now must pay the first time they go into the hospital in a calendar year.

Medicare is the government's health insurance plan for 27 million elderly Americans and almost 3 million disabled workers under 65.

Medicare patients will also have to kick in more if they spend more than 60 days in the hospital in 1987.

The so-called co-insurance amount will jump from $123 a day to $143 a day for stays of 61 to 90 days. Those hospitalized even longer will pay $286 a day, up from $246, each time they use up one of their 60 lifetime reserve days.

U.S. ranks 27th in social progress

PHILADELPHIA — The United States ranked 27th among 124 nations in providing for its citizens, in part because it spends so much on defending itself and its allies, a University of Pennsylvania professor says.

In a study of social progress released last week at the 1986 Global Development Conference in College Park, Md., Richard Estes ranked Denmark as the top performer and Angola the worst for 1980 through 1983.

Estes says improvement in the countries he studied is due to the fact that they are almost all under the United States' "nuclear umbrella."

"Relative to the United States, the northern Europeans spend very little on defense. Through our military agreements with European and Asian nations, the United States really subsidizes the social provisions of these countries, because they only have to use a small portion of their own money for defense," he said.

The Soviet Union ranked 58th in the study, which Estes attributed to a decline the growth of that nation's economy and to a large military budget, which he said was 14 percent of the Soviet gross national product.

Nations ban South African trade

BRUSSELS, Belgium — The 12 European Common Market nations on Tuesday banned the purchase of South African iron, steel and gold coins as part of a package of economic sanctions to protest apartheid.

The watered-down package also includes a ban on new investments in South Africa. However, a ban on coal imports, which would have had more impact on South Africa's economy, was not adopted.

"We've reached a conclusion that sends a clear signal of what we want to see happen in South Africa," said Sir Geoffrey Howe, he British foreign secretary and chairman of the Common Market conference of foreign ministers.

In reaction to the Europeans' decision, South African Foreign Minister R.F. Botha said the government would study ways of defending the economy. He said it would not impose punitive measures in retaliation.

The ban on iron and steel imports takes effect Sept. 27, Howe said. Further talks at a lower political level are needed to decide how to implement the ban on commercial investment and purchase of gold coins, he said.

Brazil prison escape fails; eight die

SAO PAULO, Brazil — Hundreds of heavily armed riot troopers stormed a penitentiary in southeastern Brazil on Tuesday, crushing a rebellion that left eight inmates dead and five seriously injured, police said.

The incident, in which seven hostages also suffered minor knife wounds, occurred at the penitentiary in Presidente Venceslau, 396 miles northwest of Sao Paulo.

Police inspector Roberto Jose Escudeiro told The Associated Press in a telephone interview, "Thank God it's all over. We have regained control of the prison and of the inmates."

Escudeiro said the rebellion started Monday afternoon when 17 "highly dangerous inmates grabbed 14 prison employees as hostages in a desperate attempt to escape."

"Fortunately all of the hostages were freed and only seven of them were lightly injured," he said.

Marijuana fields yield nine arrests

CLAY CENTER — Increased surveillance and investigation of marijuana fields in Clay County in northeastern Kansas have led to the arrests of nine people in the past two weeks, Undersheriff Phil Taylor said Monday.

"We understand that (underground) sources are telling everyone that Clay and Cloud counties have a lot of marijuana," Taylor said.

The Clay County Sheriff's Department has devoted extra time and manpower this summer to watch marijuana fields in the county, he said. "This is the most success we've had in a number of years," Taylor said.

Two people were arrested Sunday after they reportedly led authorities on a 45-mile chase at speeds between 120 and 140 mph, Taylor said. A pile of about 100 pounds of harvested marijuana was found in their car, Taylor said.

Five people were arrested Saturday after they reportedly were caught harvesting marijuana near the Republican River southwest of Clay Center.

Wichita man finds wife strangled

WICHITA — A man who returned home to eat lunch at his west Wichita house Tuesday discovered his wife apparently had been strangled, police said.

Capt. John Dotson said the woman, who appeared to be in her 20s, had something tied around her neck when her husband arrived. Dotson refused to say what it was that was used in the apparent strangulation.

Dotson also refused to identify the woman or her husband pending further investigation. The victim was dead on arrival at a Wichita hospital.

The couple's young child was playing in another room apparently unaware of the attack, Dotson said. The child was unharmed. The family's other child was attending school at the time of the incident.

KU offers workshops on asbestos

WASHINGTON — The University of Kansas is hitting the road in the fight against asbestos.

The school operates two modified moving vans, with 42-foot trailers, as mobile training workshops to show contractors the proper ways for removing cancer-causing asbestos from buildings. Two more semi-trailers have been purchased.

"It is basically for hands-on training," says Dale Grube, director of the program.

The tractor-trailers, one of which was in the nation's capital for a training session earlier this month, are part of the National Asbestos Training Center established at KU in 1985 under a grant from the Environmental Protection Agency.

And so far, KU's efforts have attracted nothing but praise from federal officials.

The EPA estimates that the cancer-causing substances threaten 15 million children and 1.5 million school employees nationwide. Currently the agency requires school officials to inspect buildings for disintegrating asbestos and notify staff and parents of its presence.

Politicians differ on wheat sales

WASHINGTON — Putting herself at odds with her party's candidate for Kansas governor, Sen. Nancy Kassebaum declared Tuesday that the United States should sell wheat to all buyers including the white-ruled government of South Africa.

"I believe we should sell wheat whereever we can," said Kassebaum, R-Kan. "If we're going to subsidize it to the Soviet Union, why not South Africa."

Her statement on an issue that has generated controversy in Kansas came during a question and answer period after she spoke to the National Press Club about a recent trip to Africa.

Her position stands in contrast to state Kansas House Speaker Mike Hayden, the GOP nominee for governor, who earlier this month said he opposed wheat sales to South Africa and contends it should be part of a comprehensive package of economic sanctions against the minority-ruled regime in protest of its apartheid system of racial segregation.

Hayden's remarks have drawn criticism from Democrats and farm groups. The Democratic candidate for governor, Lt. Gov. Tom Docking, says the United States should sell grain to any buyer including South Africa.

Commissioners discuss new parking lot costs

By The Collegian Staff

The 500 blocks of Poyntz Avenue and Houston Street will not pay more than $300 per year for construction and maintenance of a new downtown parking lot over the next 20 years as part of a newly formed benefit district, the City Commission decided in a 3-2 vote during its meeting Tuesday.

The parking lot will be located on the north side of the 500 block of Houston Street.

The Colonial Square Corp., which plans to build a two-story office building next to the parking lot, will pick up 38 percent of the cost. The city will pay the remainder of the bills not covered by Colonial Square and benefit district members.

The decision came after an 1½ debate concerning who would benefit the most from the "benefit district parking lot." Benefit district projects enable the city and nearby businesses to share the cost of city improvements.

Commissioners Dave Fiser and Suzanne Lindamood disapproved of the measure.

"I don't think the Chamber of Commerce and KP&L are deriving the same benefit as Colonial Square," Lindamood said.

She said the office building (being built next to the parking lot) is large enough to use the entire lot. If they do, none of the other business would benefit from the lot.

Mayor Rick Mann said the lot is for customer parking, not for employees in the office building. These employees are to park further away from the office building.

"It seems strange to me to build an office building and say, 'Rent some space in the building but we don't have a parking lot for you,'" Lindamood said.

Commissioners approved this option over four proposed plans.

The first option included 43 lots in the benefit district. Each business would pay $319.90 annually.

The second option included 35 lots, excluding the residential lots. The cost to businesses would have been $392.02.

The third option excluded some businesses that would not derive equal benefit as others. The cost would have been $508.23 for each participating business.

The fourth option included 27 lots, the same as the third option, but assessed Colonial Square 38 percent of the total cost. Other business would pay $323.60.

Agribusiness students learn about jobs

Companies present career possibilities

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

Students attending the Agribusiness Careers Fair Tuesday had the opportunity to learn about possible careers in agribusiness. But for some, the careers fair may be even more beneficial.

Several students who left the Union Ballroom met company representatives who may be future employers, said Scott Mueller, Dow Chemical representative.

Mueller is a recent graduate of K-State with a dual-major degree in agricultural economics and business administration.

"I started here four years ago, where I met for the first time with Dow Chemical and later got a job," Mueller said.

Pat Muir, president of the National Agri-Marketing Association and junior in agricultural economics, said the fair is sponsored by the Career Planning and Placement Center, the College of Agriculture and the National Agribusiness Association.

There were 26 companies participating in the fair, Muir said. He said most of the companies will be interviewing through the Career Planning and Placement Center later this semester.

"This is a chance for students to learn about these companies and for the companies to find the students who have the qualities they are seeking," Muir said.

He said the number of companies at the fair was down, but the number of students attending increased. About 260 students had viewed the exhibits by noon.

John B. Riley, assistant director of resident instruction for the College of Agriculture, said the decrease in the number of companies attending the fair reflects the depressed agricultural economy. But, he added, the numbers did not reflect the desire of companies to hire students from K-State.

This year's theme, "Shake Hands with Your Future," is significant to the purpose of the fair, Riley said. He said the future of both the student and company are influenced by the fair. Not only does the student learn about the company, but the future of the company may be shaped by meeting prospective employees.

"The fair is not just for agriculture majors," Riley said. "The companies at the fair cover a wide variety of career possibilities."

Riley said some of the participants also are seeking interns for their companies.

America must accept people seeking refuge

In August, President Reagan changed his policy of not accepting Cuban political prisoners and announced that prisoners who had served 10 years or more in Cuban jails could seek refuge in the United States.

Monday, 70 of these prisoners arrived in Miami. It was a tribute to what America is all about — freedom.

Family, friends and supporters greeted many of the former prisoners at Tropical Park in southwest Dade County, Fla. Some of the former prisoners were sent directly to other locations around the country to begin their new life.

The release of the prisoners was too long coming. Policy that bars entry of political prisoners to the United States refutes everything for which this nation was built. Many colonists were political refugees in the 1600s, and since then the United States has accepted immigrants searching for political freedom.

More political prisoners may arrive from Cuba, and they should be welcomed by the government and the people. Their plight is no different from that of our ancestors.

Officials must focus attention on hostages

While the administration storms about the release of Nicholas Daniloff from the Soviet Union, prisoners in Lebanon remain forgotten or ignored.

The Islamic Jihad, the group claiming to hold three American hostages in Lebanon, urged the administration to negotiate for the release of the prisoners, just as it bartered for Daniloff's release. The Jihad also sent a letter, apparently written by one of the hostages, David Jacobsen, that asked the administration to negotiate for their release.

The administration is questioning whether the letter was freely written. Whether the letter is legitimate is irrelevant. Even if Jacobsen did not write the letter, or if he wrote it under pressure, the points stated are true.

The letter asked, "Are not we Americans?" The hostages are American, and they are captive in a foreign country for political reasons, just like Daniloff.

Jacobsen and the other five Americans missing in Lebanon are probably suffering worse conditions than Daniloff, yet the administration was willing to sacrifice Soviet relations to secure his release.

Perhaps the administration is waiting for the same kind of media hype the Daniloff case provoked. If it takes worldwide attention to force the administation's efforts, the Islamic Jihad will play the situation to its fullest.

After going to great lengths to free Daniloff, the administration must begin talks to free the hostages in Lebanon, if only to establish consistency.

Student leaders active in campus government

MIKE KADEL
Guest Columnist

While listening to irate farmers this summer during my six-week internship with Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., and filing literally hundreds of letters daily, I began to appreciate student government at K-State. I also realized the significance of the benefits it provides through Student Government Services.

SGS represents the organizations funded by students via the $25.25 student activity fee each student pays during registration. Some organizations included in SGS are Associated Students of Kansas (K-State's student lobbying group), Student Legal Services, U-LearN, Consumer Relations Board and the Fone Crisis Center. These organizations have been determined to be vital by students and, therefore, have been funded over the years through the activity fee. Any student who pays this fee is eligible for the services.

In the same manner, anyone enrolled as a student at K-State is a member of the Student Governing Association. SGA is divided into three branches: legislative, judicial and executive. Like the federal government after which it is patterned, each branch acts as a check and balance against the others.

The legislative branch is comprised of Student Senate, its committees and various task forces. Senate's main duty is to distribute the approximately $810,000 in student activity fees to various groups and services through the allocation process. Senate is also responsible for passing any legislation dealing with student concerns. As Student Senate Chairperson, Sally Traeger, senior in marketing, oversees the entire legislative process.

SGA's judicial branch is responsible for hearing all cases regarding violations of campus regulations and guidelines. Student Review Board, which hears cases involving off-campus students, is similar to Interfraternity Council, Panhellenic Council and residence hall judicial boards. Traffic appeals board, by far the most popular part of this branch, serves as an appellate board for KSU Police Department citations.

Tribunal, the final court of appeals for students, may hear certain cases in first hearing. Tribunal also is the only student judicial board with the authority to request the removal of a student from the University. David Ott, student attorney general and junior in chemical engineering, heads the judicial branch.

The third and final branch of student government is the executive branch, which consists of the Student Body President and his cabinet. The main priority of Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics and student body president, is voicing student opinion. One route he takes to accomplish this is by assigning various cabinet members to specific issues, like the limited availability of parking and recruitment and retention of students.

In my position as chief of staff, I am currently formulating a priority list of student concerns. Other cabinet members also are busy with various tasks. For example, Andy Martin, senior in chemical science and college council coordinator, is working to increase the efficiency of the colleges' ambassador programs.

Because this has been only a brief look at student government at K-State, I encourage you to visit the SGS office on the ground floor of the Union if you have any questions or would like additional information. And if you have any concerns about University policy, address them to a student government official. As a student leader, I guarantee it is the only way student government can work for you.

SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Columnist

Advocates of censorship are a constant source of frustration for me.

They climb atop their mighty white pedestal of morality and preach the only way to prevent the country's innocent young minds from becoming contaminated with filth is to ban any form of media that contains it.

In their mind's eye, making objectionable material unavailable will prevent young people from reading it. Consequently, none of those offensive ideas will enter their sweet, innocent minds. The nation's youth will be saved, and America will once again become the land of clean hearts and pure minds.

Undaunted by the fact that a number of the texts on their objectionable books list are considered classics in American literature, these crusaders demand that school boards strip libraries of "Brave New World," "Huckleberry Finn" and, in some instances, the Bible.

They bring petitions to city councils calling for ordinances banning certain books from public libraries and making the sale of pornographic entertainment illegal. It is fortunate America has laws against invasion of privacy, or some extremists might demand entry into people's homes to delete all offensive material.

Activists base their legal actions on the theory that everyone fears and respects the law of the land. Therefore, nobody would dare buy "The Grapes of Wrath" or "Penthouse" or rent the videotape of "Deep Throat" on the black market.

This is a very naive view of the world. Although local authorities could close "red light" districts, an individual could buy contraband videotapes, magazines or books and open an underground bookstore or movie theater.

These public policy tactics ultimately would fail because they don't cut to the heart of the matter — a person's morality.

The state cannot regulate each person's morality. Only the individual has control over his moral outlook.

If a person wanted to influence another's basic value system, he should start very early in life. Children are more impressionable than adults.

Although the degree of a person's objection to filthy language, sex or pornography may change as he grows older, his basic concept of whether these things are morally right or wrong usually would remain intact.

Because parents and adult family members have the most contact with their children, it is their responsiblity to teach them values that build strong character.

But at some point in time, a person must be responsible for his own actions. Once a person reaches adulthood, he has the right to choose which books he wants to read or which movies he wants to see.

There is no perfect answer to objections about the questionable content of certain media. But denying access to materials because one does not approve of them is denying the rights of another person to determine the course of his life.

Any action taken against "immoral materials" should be directed at the materials' sources. But burning library books isn't the best way for people to make public their objections.

Picketing the residence of the material's publisher or producer or sponsoring a protest march in front of the business is one way of gaining the public's attention. Another possible course of action is boycotting any manufacturer that advertises in a magazine or supports the production of the material in some way. But the most constructive action would be to instruct children about moral sensibility and common decency.

These may seem like paper solutions that carry no weight, but, in reality, they are stronger than any law a council could pass.

While a new ordinance would increase the number of laws, working within the existing structure of laws would strengthen the law itself.

Apartment hunt proves confusing

WAYNE LONG
Collegian Columnist

I decided for a variety of reasons it was time to say goodbye to fraternity life and introduce myself to apartment living this year.

But before being able to live in an apartment, a person must find one suitable to his or her taste. Little did I know what I was in for.

I immediately began to feel intimidated when I opened the newspaper to the classified ads section and saw three different headings for apartments: furnished apartments, unfurnished apartments and furnished/unfurnished apartments.

Let the confusion begin.

Under furnished apartments were several listings for one-, two-, three- and four-bedroom apartments, yet these were not as expensive as the corresponding places listed under unfurnished apartments.

In other words, on the average, it was more expensive to live in a place where they didn't provide you a place to sit down than it was to have them provide this sitting place for you.

To complicate things, under the heading of unfurnished apartments were several listings that were "partially furnished." Why they didn't have a heading of their own, I don't know.

I did not even attempt to understand the third heading — furnished/unfurnished apartments, which included both furnished and unfurnished apartments. Why they weren't included under the other headings, I don't know.

Already, I felt terribly out of control as to where I was going to end up living, so I just started from the top.

My first conversation went something like this:

"Hello."

"Hi, my name is Wayne Long and I'm calling about the apartment you have advertised in the paper."

"Which one?"

What did he mean which one? I'd never seen the place before; how was I suppose to know?

"The one that reads 'one bedroom apartment, no pets, $250 per month.'"

"Oh, that one. I'm sorry it's already been leased."

Picturing a traditional family neighborhood sent chills down my spine. I could see the kids playing in the street, hear the dogs barking at night and could smell the barbecues barbecuing.

Unfortunately, no one answered when I called. Maybe this traditional family didn't think it was traditional to spend evenings at home. Perhaps this traditional family took a traditional August vacation and put their traditional ad in the paper for some traditional family fun.

The ad that amused me most had three different numbers to call. Obviously, this guy really wanted or needed to do business.

Yet, I called all three numbers and no one, not even an answering machine, answered the phone.

Where in the world was this guy?

I mean, if I put three phone numbers in the paper, I'd feel responsible to be at one of them. Unless I just wanted everyone to think I was hard to get a hold of.

Before finding an apartment that was suitable for me, I did go look at one other place. Oh, to be a federal housing inspector.

I should have been intelligent enough to realize by the outside appearance of the house and the cars parked on the front lawn that this was not the place to live without full-coverage life insurance. But I and a friend went in anyway.

The landlord didn't say a word when he opened the front door, and upon stepping inside I was immediately overcome by the feeling the whole place was held together by Elmer's glue.

I walked into the kitchen expecting to see a rat run across the stove and disappear into his own private entrance to the refrigerator.

Opening the door to the hallway, I saw clouds of smoke rolling down the stairs and instantly thought of the fire drills we use to have in grade school.

"Only $200 a month," the landlord said. "What do you think?"

"It's big," I said. "Here are three phone numbers you can call if you ever want to try and sell this place to me again."

Protesting relevant

Editor,

Re: The editorial "Lecturers should talk on students' concerns" in Monday's Collegian.

In view of the Collegian's opinion that Secretary of Education William Bennett's Landon Lecture on Public Issues was uninteresting and the Collegian's banal encouragement that students should not interrupt lectures, I would like to present some words from one of Bennett's more interesting lectures as printed in the New York Times May 15. His topic was students who interrupt lectures.

"Instead of promoting tolerance, freedom of inquiry and the acquisition of knowledge," Bennett said, "campus radicals nowadays tend to see the university as a kind of fortress at war with society, an arsenal whose principal task is to raise revolutionary consciousness, frustrate the government, discredit authority and promote a radical transformation of society."

He added, "Just as a fortress under siege does not invite enemy spokesmen to address the troops, so too have campus radicals prevented Jeanne Kirkpatrick, Casper Weinberger and other administration spokesmen from presenting their point of view to the student body.

"What we have seen in recent years is the rise of a significant body of opinion on the campus which more or less openly rejects the democratic ethic."

It is interesting to note that the isolated incidents of interruptions of Kirkpatrick and Weinberger occurred three years before Bennett's lecture. One cannot help but wonder if the lecture had anything to do with the demonstrators which confronted, but did not interrupt, Secretary of State George Shultz at K-State in April of 1986.

What a shame it is that Bennett did not think to share those ideas with K-State. Perhaps that would have been too relevant. He chose to deliver this lecture before the American Jewish Committee.

New faculty brings change to College of Vet Medicine

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This is the eighth in a series on new administration.

A new head of the Department of Veterinary Diagnosis, as well as several new faculty, highlight the administrative changes in the College of Veterinary Medicine, said John Noordsy, associate dean.

Mahlon Vorhies joined the college Aug. 1 as the head of the Department of Veterinary Diagnosis and the director of the Veterinary Diagnostic Laboratory. He succeeded Harry Anthony, who retired in July.

Vorhies earned his doctorate in veterinary medicine from Iowa State University in 1956. He was head of the Department of Veterinary Science and director of the Animal Disease Research and Diagnostic Laboratory at South Dakota University from 1973 until this year. Vorhies was named Veterinarian of the Year by the South Dakota Veterinary Medical Association in 1978.

New in the Department of Surgery and Medicine are Joseph Harari and John Garst.

Harari is an assistant professor and small animal surgeon. He received his doctorate from the Department of Pathology at Michigan State University and completed his residency in the small animal surgery section at the University of Illinois. Harari was recently with Seattle Veterinary Specialists.

Garst is a new associate professor with the comparative toxicology laboratories. He received his doctorate in medicinal chemistry from the University of Iowa and was recently an assistant professor in the Toxicological Department of Animal Sciences at the University of Illinois.

In the Department of Laboratory Medicine, two new assistant professors, one temporary instructor and one temporary associate professor join the staff.

Scott McVey is a new assistant professor in immunology. He received his doctorate in veterinary microbiology and immunology at Texas A&M University and received his doctorate in veterinary medicine from University of Tennessee. His research interests are in immunology of various infectious agents.

Nanabanyin Ghartey-Tagoe is a temporary instructor of veterinary clinical physiology on leave from the University of Tuskegee in Alabama. He received his doctorate and master's degree from the University of Tuskegee and is pursuing his second doctoral degree in clinical pathology at K-State.

Kurt Weingand is a new assistant professor in clinical pathology. He completed his graduate training and received his doctorate from Colorado State University. He received his doctorate of veterinary medicine from the University of Missouri.

Yousef Al-Doory is a temporary associate professor of mycology. He is on leave from the George Washington School of Medicine in Washington, D.C., where he was chief of medical mycology for 12 years. Al-Doory's interests are in research of opportunistic fungi of animals and man.

In the Department of Anatomy and Physiology, one new faculty member joins the staff. Deryl Troyer is a new assistant professor in microanatomy. He received his doctorate in veterinary medicine from K-State and was previously a faculty member at the University of Illinois.

Bid for convention at K-State fails

By The Collegian Staff

Efforts to "sell" K-State as the best location for the 1987 Student Alumni Association/Student Foundation National Convention were unsuccessful, said Glennis Carlson, director of administrative services and foundation adviser.

Instead, the event will be at Clemson (S.C.) University, Carlson said.

Nine members of the Student Foundation and the Student Alumni Board made a bid to make K-State the 1987 convention site during this year's national convention held Labor Day weekend in Santa Barbara, Calif.

One week before the 1986 convention, a representative of the host school, the University of California, contacted the foundation to suggest they consider making a bid, Carlson said.

"The Student Foundation made a bid in 1984, and it took six months of planning to get it ready," she said. "This year's group worked together extremely well for the time allotted.

"Long hours of preparation actually brought the group closer together, and an excellent presentation was put together."

Bid presentations could last up to 15 minutes and consist of skits, school songs, slide shows and speeches, Carlson said.

This year, the alumni board helped the foundation make the presentation. LewJene Schneider, director of Alumni and Student Programs and adviser to the board, said none of the students attending the convention had ever attended one.

"The students saw it as a real challenge," Schneider said. "Having only a short time, the SAB and SF worked together to put on a superb presentation.

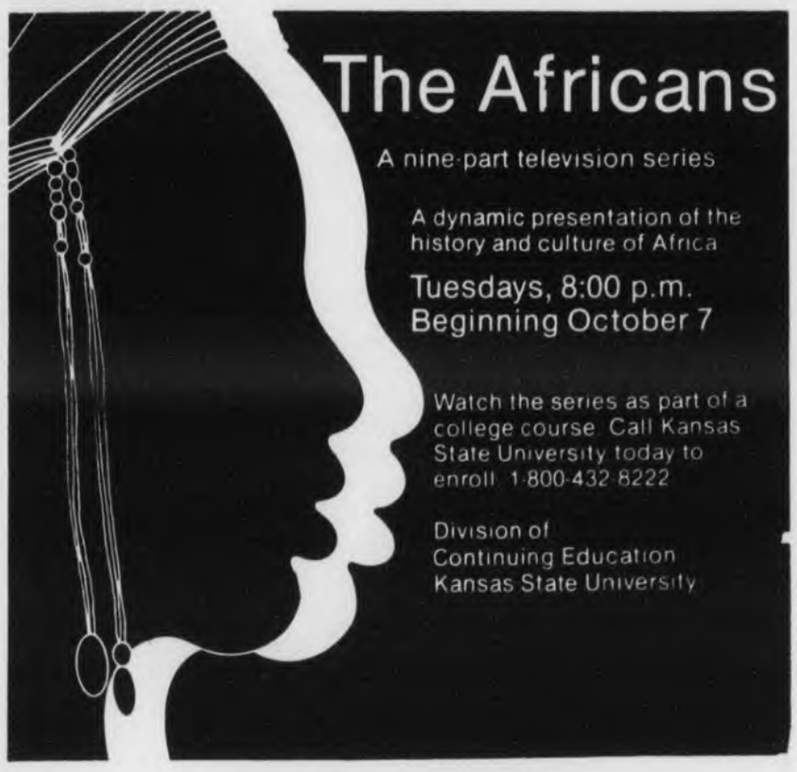
"Even though we did not get the bid, we learned to work together as separate groups for a common cause."

While the board works with alumni relations, student recruitment and fund raising, the foundation is involved in service projects for the students and the University, Carlson said.

Even though the two groups have separate projects, Schneider said she thinks the groups will be more supportive of each other's endeavors.

The national convention consisted of seminars on self-improvement, motivation, membership drives and other topics pertaining to the student groups. More than 100 schools were represented by delegates and advisers, Carlson said.

"We brought back some neat ideas to help us create some new, positive campus activities," said Sheryl Burton, foundation secretary-treasurer and senior in mechanical engineering. "The convention helped us to become better organized and form a tighter-knit group."



By attending the seminars, K-State's alumni board acquired 30 new ideas that are being summarized for a complete file, said Kent Bradley, alumni board president and junior in nutrition.

"Most of the ideas we received will have to be modified to fit our budget," Bradley said.

One new idea is to revise the survival kits. Survival kits are sent to students with "survival accessories" like pencils, candy, cups and erasers. The suggested revision would add coupons to the kits, he said.

Lebanon hostages ignored by administration, minister says

By The Associated Press

WILLIAMSVILLE, N.Y. — Former hostage Benjamin Weir said Tuesday the government is following a double standard by negotiating with the Soviets over an American reporter but refusing to bargain for the Lebanon hostages' release.

"I do feel that the administration could take a more active role in this and believe that the Daniloff case provides that kind of precedent," the Presbyterian minister said. "We don't care if they use the word negotiate or not, but we would like to see them talking and opening up a line of communication."

U.S. News & World Report correspondent Nicholas Daniloff was arrested by the Soviets on Aug. 30 and charged with spying. After weeks of negotiations, he was released Friday into the custody of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow. Simultaneously, a Soviet United Nations employee charged in New York with spying was released to the custody of his ambassador.

Weir, who was held for 16 months by Shiite Moslem extremists, planned to meet later in the day with Peggy Say, the sister of Lebanon hostage Terry A. Anderson. He spoke at a news conference on his arrival in the Buffalo area.

Weir, 62, said a letter released Tuesday by Islamic Jihad, purportedly from hostage David Jacobsen, was an imporant development in the long-running hostage drama.

"There should be a very considerable response to it," he said.

"The opportunity and the precedent for seeking to negotiate their (the Lebanon hostages') release is before us and ought not to be lost," Weir said.

In Huntington Beach, Calif., Jacobsen's son said Tuesday that the letter purportedly written by his father seemed to reflect the elder Jacobsen's views despite numerous misspellings and grammatical errors. It contained criticism similar to Weir's.

"I'd like to see the letter in its entirety," Eric Jacobsen said, "but it doesn't really contradict anything that's been said before, that I can tell."

Islamic Jihad, a Shiite Moslem extremist group, released the three-page handwritten letter to a Western news agency in Moslem west Beirut earlier Tuesday. Its authenticity could not be confirmed, although Jacobsen's signature appeared identical to that on an earlier letter.

It accused President Reagan of caring more about Daniloff than for the American captives in Lebanon, three of whom have been held hostage for more a year.

Eric Jacobsen said the last letter he received from his father did not contain the kind of spelling and grammatical mistakes found in Tuesday's letter.

He cautioned that it would be difficult for him to assess its authenticity until he has had a chance to see it. Parts of the letter were read to him in a brief telephone interview.

"At the same time," Eric Jacobsen added, "the message of the letter is not that surprising and would reflect my father's opinion, if he's had access to the press and read that President Reagan is so upset about the Daniloff case."

The letter asks: "Why was Reagan interested minute by minute with spy journalist Daneloff but he is not interested one minute in our story and he didn't do anything to solve it. ... Are not we Americans?"

The younger Jacobsen said the administration has refused to negotiate for the release of his father, who has been held for 17 months.

"Obviously, we're real concerned and angered and confused at the discrepancy and the inconsistency of the government's policy," Jacobsen said, "and I can understand how my father, if he knows about this (the Daniloff case), can be frustrated by it."

On Monday, Say said the Reagan administration's treatment of the Daniloff case was "a bitter slap in the face" for her and other relatives of the Lebanon hostages.

Refusal to submit to an alcohol test is admissible as evidence against a person charged with DUI. Plea bargaining, or attempting to have the DUI charge reduced to a lesser charge (such as reckless driving) generally is not permitted. A person convicted of DUI is not eligible for release on probation or suspension of sentence until the minimum sentence is served. The law now allows for collection of crime victims reparations in DUI offenses. Illegally obtaining beer or liquor (a class A misdemeanor) can result in a fine up to $2,500,000 or a jail sentence up to one year.

Citrus . . . strength in the C

So how much is too much?

Photography by Brad Fanshier
Story by Darla Ryan

For years — ever since celebrities and fitness gurus started praising it for its almost mystical powers — vitamin C and its effects on the common cold have become a subject of controversy.

Some specialists have said large doses of vitamin C tablets will help prevent or cure colds. Opponents, who say the increase from tablets could be harmful, report that the vitamin should be taken in natural dosages, such as orange juice.

Charles W. Marshall, who has a doctorate in chemistry, wrote a book in 1985 on the subject, titled "Vitamins and Minerals: Help or Harm?" The book, a compilation of the research conducted by 20 to 30 nutrition investigators, was published by the Consumer's Union, which publishes "Consumer Reports."

"Most scientists have found no conclusive evidence suggesting that vitamin C has any effect on the prevention of colds or lessens its severity," Marshall said. "In my opinion, there is no reason to supplement on days you don't have a cold. However, vitamin C can offer a slight reduction in the symptoms of a cold.

"However," Marshall added, "vitamin C does give some protection from viral infections, probably by increasing the fighting capacity of blood cells, raising overall health and, thus, the ability to overcome stress."

Marshall said he recommends taking a vitamin supplement only when the body's own supply of the vitamin C level decreases, such as within the first few days of severe infections, burns or surgery. Under these circumstances, a supplement of 250 milligrams, but never more than 500 milligrams, should be taken, he said.

The amount of vitamin C the average person should consume also is a controversial subject.

Kathy Grunewald, associate professor of foods and nutrition and a registered dietician, said people should weigh the potential benefits of vitamin C against the possible toxic side effects.

"Studies have shown if — and that's a big if — there is a benefit (of vitamin C), you should not exceed 250 milligrams per day," Grunewald said. "If you get larger than that, your risks will likely exceed the benefits."

The U.S. recommended daily allowance of vitamin C is 60 milligrams for people over 4 years of age.

Large doses of vitamin C can lead to the breakdown of vitamin B-12, which aids in the development of red blood cells, Grunewald said. It also can prompt the development of kidney stones and digestive symptoms, such as diarrhea, abdominal cramps and nausea.

Grunewald said the body develops a need for vitamins when it becomes ill.

"When you do become sick, your need for many of the water-soluble vitamins increases, but the exact amount is not known," she said.

There is some evidence that small amounts of vitamin C may decrease the severity of colds, but large doses can have a negative effect, she said.

"Researchers have suggested that if you continue to take large doses of vitamin C, you develop a tolerance to the large doses, so that when you do need them, you develop a rebound deficiency," Grunewald said.

However, she said, vitamin tablets are not the answer.

"They should not take it (vitamin C) in pill form," she said. "I see no reason why that's needed."

Grunewald, who believes the powers of vitamin C are exaggerated, said that because the average person gets the proper amount of vitamin C through a normal diet, tablets are unnecessary.

"If they just up their consumption of fruit and fruit juices, they can easily get the vitamin C they need," she said.

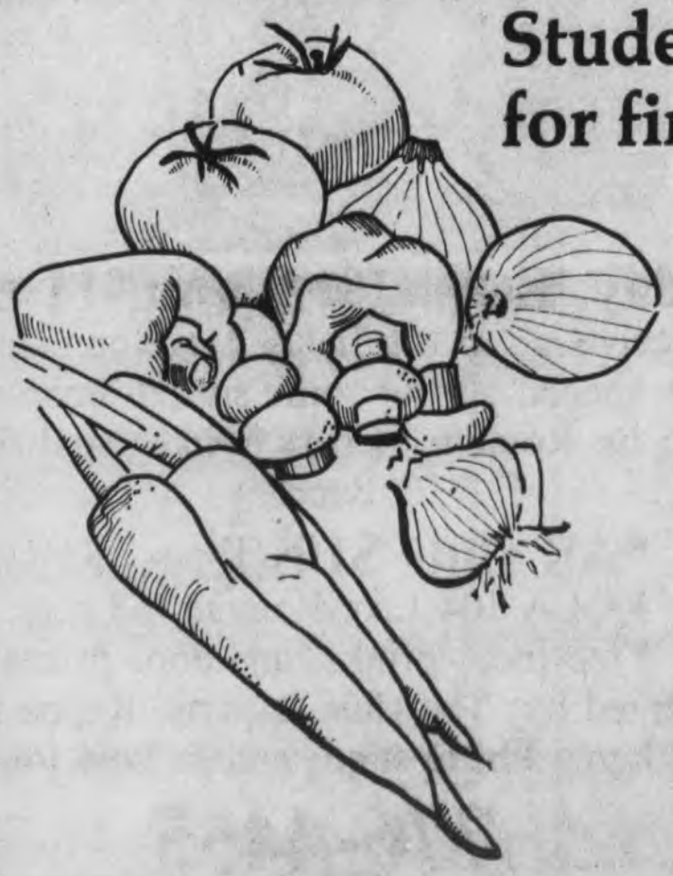
There are certain people, Marshall said in his book, who need a higher daily consumption rate of the vitamin. Pregnant women need 80 milligrams and women who are breast feeding need 100 milligrams.

In the book, the author said smokers have lower vitamin C blood levels than non-smokers and may need 50 percent more vitamin C. An extra serving of most fruits or vegetables should meet their vitamin C needs.

Also, those who are dieting need to take a supplement or include vitamin C-rich foods in their diets, Marshall said in his book.

Connie Anderson, head nurse of Nutri System Weight Loss Center in Manhattan, said the center recommends that their clients take additional vitamins to supplement the diet.

"We always suggest using our multi-vitamins to make up for the vitamins they lose while dieting," Anderson said.



Anderson said a similar policy is followed at most diet and nutrition centers.

Dieting is not the only way the body may lose its needed vitamins. Marshall said the method of cooking food may alter its content of vitamin C.

"If the only way you get vitamin C is through food, the way you cook it is very important to preserve the vitamin," Marshall said .

"Cooking vegetables for a very short time in as little water as possible is best," he said. "Frozen fruits are usually processed right after picking, which kills the enzymes that destroy the vitamin C. So, frozen fruits and vegetables actually have more vitamin C than supermarket-fresh food."

Students find selecting fruits, vegetables for first time produces sweet, sour feelings

By The Collegian Staff

For many students doing food shopping for the first time, selecting quality fruits and vegetables can become a hit-and-miss task: hit with the grapefruit, miss with the avocado and chalk up the wasted money to experience.

However, selecting fresh fruits and vegetables in the grocery store does not have to be such a mysterious or time-consuming chore. By following a few suggestions, shoppers can learn to choose ripe food and reduce the time spent in the produce department.

"In general, look for a bright color that is characteristic of that particular fruit or vegetable," said Carole A.Z. Harbers, associate professor of foods and nutrition. She also said shoppers should look for a minimum number of defects.

The skin on citrus fruits should be smooth. Often, the heavier the fruit feels, the more juice it contains. When fruits like grapefruits and peaches seem to have a pink blush, they are usually sweeter, she said.

Crispness is important when selecting fresh leafy vegetables, such as lettuce and cabbage, said Ron Lundberg, produce manager of Safeway Stores Inc., 3011 Anderson Ave. The leaves on lettuce should not be wilted or limp, he said.

Potatoes that are begining to turn green or tomatoes that are too soft should be avoided, Lundberg said.

Jeff Howland, produce clerk at Dillon's, 632 Tuttle Creek Blvd., said there are three basic things to look for in selecting fruit or vegetables.

"They all should be uniform, symmetrical and firm," Howland said. "If it looks odd-shaped, it could be bad.

Howland said another thing to look for is if the fruit or vegetable feels cold. His store keeps fruits and vegetables in a walk-in cooler until they are placed in the display coolers, he said. Cool produce is the best to choose.

While color is often regarded in reference to a fruit or vegetable's quality, Howland said it really isn't important.

"Color can be kind of deceptive, because with oranges they (the manufacturers) use dye and they wax the apples," he said.

Howland said most fruit is shipped before it is ripe, so by the time it reaches the store's counters, it will be at peak condition.

"It should be ripe (when) we get it," he said.

Problems occur when the warehouse rotates produce so that the oldest is used first. Many times what arrives at the store is overly ripe.

"Ninety percent of our problems involve getting stuff from the warehouse that's been kept too long," Howland said.

If a shopper has any questions about what to look for or what to avoid in fresh fruits and vegetables, produce department employees are a useful source of information, both Howland and Harbers said.

By MELISSA RANSON
Collegian Reporter

Every month, the Manhattan Animal Shelter at the Sunset Zoo receives about 100 lost or abandoned pets.

"Of these animals, about one-third are reclaimed by their original owners, and about one-third are taken into new homes," said Ann Collins, administrator at the shelter.

If Beverly Hashagen, director of Pet Hotline, gets her way, the rest of the animals will be placed into new homes. Pet Hotline is a 24-hour, Manhattan-based hotline offering services like Foster Pethome, a program designed to find homes for abandoned animals or return lost animals to their owners.

"We use no euthanasia except when physically necessary," Hashagen said. "What we try to do is to educate people that animals have rights, too. They need to be treated properly, not dumped at the closest animal shelter."

Foster Pethome began four years ago when an ice storm caused the animal shelter's capacity to overflow. Hashagen found temporary homes for these animals. Foster Pethome temporarily ended the service June 1 because of a dangerous rate in animal diseases, she said.

Pet Hotline plans to start the program again soon, she said, because Manhattan has the problem of animals needing homes more than ever this year.

"We don't blame the students for this problem," Hashagen said. "It's just that with the University and Fort Riley we have a very transient community. But this is not an isolated case."

"These pets usually stay anywhere from two days to two weeks," she said. "But since we have no time limit to find homes for the animals, our adoption rate is 100 percent."

The program matches abandoned animals with families looking for a pet. Hashagen said Foster Pethome follows its placement cases, and if the owners are not satisfied or if they are not giving proper care to the animals, the home takes the pets back.

The program "will go to great lengths to find good homes for these animals," she said.

Pet Hotline serves as a phone information center for people with animal problems or questions.

"We get calls with concerns over sick animals and lost animals. We even get calls from the state about animals that have been hit on the road," Hashagen said. "If Pet Hotline can't help them, we tell the callers who can."

Software, training shortage keeps farm computer sales low

By BARRY STEFFEN
Collegian Reporter

Three of the major reasons analysts believe farm-related computer sales have not increased include a lack of knowledge, troubled farm economy and shortage of software.

"A lot of people are kind of scared of (computers) or not willing to spend the time to learn about them," said George Brandsberg, documentations coordinator for the computer systems office at K-State.

Less than 10 percent of all farmers use computers for their business, said Darrell Holiday, marketing director at Kansas Farm Bureau.

Holiday said he believes one of the main reasons for this low percentage is the lack of computer training materials available for farmers.

"(Farmers) were told they needed a computer. So they went out and bought one not knowing how to use it," Holiday said. "So now, a lot of computers are sitting around on shelves collecting dust."

Holiday said fewer than 5 percent of all farmers use Farm Bureau's data base market information system. He said the main reason for the small percentage is due to a lack of marketing knowledge.

"Why does anyone want to know about a futures market if they don't know how to use it?" Holiday said.

Farm market systems currently aren't all that valuable to producers, said Don Pretzer, agricultural economist at the University.

Pretzer said the farm crisis and expenses are two reasons why computers aren't being purchased.

The expense of the telephone call to hook up to the market data base and the expense of a computer often hinder the use of the market system, he said.

Rick Teaford, sales representative at Radio Shack, 2609 Anderson Ave., said the cost of a computer is $1,200 to $1,500, and to add a printer, which farmers would probably need, is another $600 to $900.

With the farming situation as it is, Teaford said he could see why a farmer would be hesitant to buy something like a computer that may not fulfill his purposes.

"We may sell more computers to farmers than we realize," Teaford said. "A lot of rural people come with other reasons for buying a computer, such as for their kids, then end up adding programs for their own use."

Pretzer said fewer than 5 percent of all commercial farms have computers.

Pretzer and Brandsberg agreed that the lack of software and computers in county extension offices is another problem slowly being corrected.

Brandsberg said that five years ago only two county extension offices had computers. That number, he said, has increased to about 40.

Farmers haven't been able to see how the software works, and there hasn't been a lot of it until recently.

Brandsberg said there have been a number of farm-related software programs introduced by people at K-State in the past few years. The ProSeries is the most complex of these programs, he said. ProSeries is a commodity management series.

Other software programs which are being or have been produced at K-State are Beef and Crop Enterprise Analysis, K-Farm, Feedlot Manager and European Corn Borer Management, Brandsberg said.

Ag programs benefit U.S. agency

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reporter

The International Agricultural Programs office at K-State has been enlisted to help the federal government, said Vernon C. Larson, director of the programs.

"Last March, the Agency for International Development and K-State started working together in the international areas," Larson said. "Essentially, our programs are used to make the Agency's work more effective."

IAP is a major part of the University's agricultural influence, he said.

The University has been involved in international agriculture since the 1950s. But in 1975, changes in laws allowed federal funding for international programs, Larson said. Because K-State had a good background in this area, it was one of several land-grant schools to receive funding.

"We received $157,000, which we had to match with non-federal funds," he said. "Then last spring, the AID proposed a new method. It is called the 'Memorandum of Understanding' and is basically the same situation as the first, except we are working more closely with the AID."

The main goal of the programs is to help underdeveloped nations become self-sufficient, which can be accomplished in many ways, he said.

"We help build learning institutions," Larson said. "We actually build schools, for instance Ahmadu Bello in Nigeria. We teach them how to solve their agricultural problems.

"Our main goal is giving people a pragmatic education that will raise their standard of living."

The University gets something out of the programs, too, he said. The faculty is enhanced by the overseas experiences, and the lessons learned are then handed down to the students.

"This international dimension is essential for a first-rate university," Larson said.

Besides taking the knowledge abroad, Larson said the programs also help bring in students. He said the University has students from 70 countries in agriculture.

"Most of all," he said, "the programs are a humanitarian effort. You can't let half the world go hungry and have peace."

Reggae band performance shows blacks' struggle, disc jockey says

By The Collegian Staff

Reggae music is an art form that expresses the plight and struggle for independence of the black man in Jamaica and Africa.

The Blue Riddim Band, a reggae group from Kansas City that has been nominated for a Grammy, will give a free concert from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Thursday on the island between Seaton Hall and the Union.

"The hymns are spiritual and rejoiceful because they praise the existence of Jah (God)," said Neal Climenhaga, disc jockey of the KSDB reggae radio show "Midnight Dread" and senior in English. "This music is a way that the African can rejoice and praise Jah, despite their fight for freedom and happiness."

The Mexican-American Council of Students, Black Student Union, Native American-Indian Student Body and Puerto Rican Student Organization will host this cultural event.

"This activity is an opportunity for everyone to see reggae music at its best and to witness culture from another society." said Andrea Shelton, BSU president and senior in journalism and mass communications.

Students rent art to improve decor

By The Collegian Staff

The Union Program Council's art rentals may have the answer for students who are tired of staring at bare walls.

Today is the final day of the UPC-sponsored art rental display in the Union Courtyard. Any student, faculty or staff can rent up to three pieces of artwork for the semester to brighten up their walls.

Rental costs vary from $1 to $5 but are usually $2 to $3, said Marilyn Woodward, UPC program adviser.

Woodward said UPC has been sponsoring the art rental display every semester for around 15 years and has built up its collection over the years.

The display includes more than 140 pieces that are art reproductions, original prints or laser art, the latest addition to the collection.

Pam Lutz, senior in business, said she thought there would be even more students renting artwork this year.

"It seems that more students are into art and prints from famous artists," Lutz said. "The kitten posters we used to have in our bedrooms are not appropriate anymore."

Blacks participating in college athletics either obtain education or misdirection

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the third in a five-part series titled "College Athletics in America." The series will appear throughout this week on the sports page.

Veryl Switzer says if it hadn't been for his experiences as one of the first black football players in what was then the Big Seven Conference, he's not sure what his life would be like today.

Switzer, the University's director of minority affairs, was a star running back at K-State from 1951-53.

"If it hadn't been for athletics, I'm not sure where I would be today," Switzer said. "Maybe I'd be working on a farm somewhere, but you never know. I've lived the good life because of my athletic experiences."

Switzer was a pioneer — one of the first black men to compete in intercollegiate athletics. Since then, much has been said about the treatment of the black student-athlete.

People on one side of the issue would say that big-time athletic programs lure in blacks for their athletic abilities and spit them out with little concern given for their education.

Those on the other side would say intercollegiate athletics has provided an avenue of equality for all blacks.

University President Jon Wefald has no doubts whether or not college athletics has used the black athlete.

"Oh, definitely," Wefald said. "That has to change. If you look at the post World War II era and the emergence of the black athlete in the late 1960s, the role of the black athlete has been a major force.

"There have been many schools and too many programs that have attracted the black athlete to play for them and haven't given them the same consideration for academics and treated them as persons who simply wanted to carve out a career for themselves."

Switzer agreed with Wefald to a certain extent.

"Certainly, there has been exploitation," Switzer said. "But I think in the main it has enhanced the black athlete's chance to broaden their horizons by giving them a chance for an education."

Athletic Director Larry Travis also said he believes intercollegiate athletics offers the black athlete a chance to get an education.

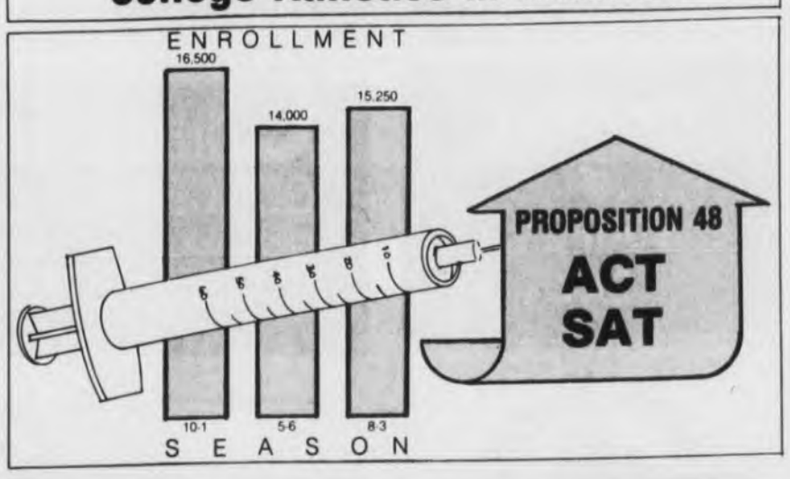
"If a kid comes in and stays three years, even if he doesn't complete his degree there but goes on to finish somewhere else, I don't think you've used him," Travis said. "I think he's a better person for the experience."

Switzer is proud to have gone down in history as the fourth black man to play football in the Big Seven.

"I was a pioneer," Switzer said, "perceived by the black community as breaking the racial barriers. I had a mission to excel the positive image of blackness."

Wefald has seen progress in the treatment of the black athlete during his years as an educational administrator.

"I think it's changing," he said. "I think more and more schools are approaching athletes, black or white, with great concern and compassion for not only treating them as athletes, but as people."



Former K-State basketball star Rolando Blackman said he believes that when a person says he was used by a school for his athletic abilities, the person is simply pointing his finger in the wrong direction.

"The thing about the black athlete is he's used because he lets himself be used. It's the school's fault but primarily the athlete's fault for letting himself be indulged that way," Blackman said.

"Some (black student-athletes) will be academically successful and some will not," Switzer said. "That opportunity (to get a college education) is important and significant."

Collegian reporter Jeff Rapp also contributed to this story. The series' fourth article, which will appear Thursday, concerns drugs and intercollegiate athletics.

Gators delay naming new athletic director

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

More time is needed before a new athletic director will be named at the University of Florida in Gainesville, according to Al Alsobrook, vice president of Florida's university relations office.

A Florida search committee made its scheduled presentation to the university president's office today, but the committee didn't name a prospective AD. One of the finalists for the Gator position is K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis.

The search committee recommended that the search continue for a replacement to the retiring AD, Bill Carr.

"The committee made no recommendation," Alsobrook said. "They suggested that the search continue, but they wanted it made clear that they did not reject anybody.

"The committee simply said they wanted to present the president with more names. They weren't ready to make a decision."

Alsobrook said the Florida president had not received the committee's decision to continue the search today because he was out of town. A statement from the president's office will be issued sometime next week, he said.

The committee will select additional prospects from the list of 59 applicants and nominees and will not seek new sources, Alsobrook said.

Seven finalists originally were selected from that list. In addition to Travis, finalists are athletic directors David Wagner of Georgia Southern, Fred Grunninger of Rutgers and Richard Young of Washington State.

At the search committee's meeting today, two members said two finalists were "unacceptable." The committee members did not name the finalists they were talking about.

According to today's issue of the Jacksonville Times-Union, the committee wants additional time because they believe more of the original prospects will be available when football season is completed.

The other finalists — Louisiana State football coach Bill Arnsbarger, University of Arizona AD Cedric Warren Dempsey and North Carolina University AD John Swofford — withdrew their names because of bad timing, Alsobrook said.

Ten others, who were originally considered for the job, withdrew their names from consideration for the same reason, the Times-Union reported.

NCAA source of athletic problems

Appearing throughout this week on the sports page is a series of stories concerning the state of intercollegiate athletics.

The five topics being discussed in the series are the impact of athletic success upon enrollment, the raising of academic standards with the National Collegiate Athletic Association's adoption of Proposition 48, intercollegiate athletics and the black athlete, drugs usage by collegiate athletes and the academic role of the student-athlete.

At a time when there is much controversy surrounding intercollegiate athletics, this series is aimed at uncovering the ideas and opinions of K-State administration, athletic officials and student-athletes on these topics.

I believe many of the problems with college athletics grow out of the inept administrative handling by the organization that is in charge of big-time college athletics.

The NCAA has become an obese structure of rules and regulations so complex that, at times, the organization itself cannot wade through the trash they are trying to enforce.

Tim Fitzgerald
Sports Editor

When the NCAA's committees work their way through the ridiculous number of rules, the decisions they pass down are often ludicrous.

NCAA rulings often unduly penalize the weak — thus, keeping the schools down when they are down. Or the decisions slap the wrists of the mighty — thus, not making the NCAA appear as the bad guy picking fights with the nationally known schools. Sometimes the NCAA pounds a school that finds problems within its athletic organization and turns itself in — thus, forcing all those schools who want to clean up their acts to run for the hills.

The former two circumstances are distressing, but the latter could be devastating to any effort the NCAA might put forth in cleaning up college athletics.

To discourage schools that find previous coaching staffs or alumni have blatantly violated NCAA rules from practicing self-disclosure is insane.

But common sense has never been a strong point of the NCAA. If it was, the NCAA's rules and regulations would have been revised long ago so that even the best lawyer could untangle the meaning.

Proposition 48 was a bright spot and a flash of hope for the NCAA.

But, in its imperfection, the NCAA passed a rule that totally ignored the issue of standardized tests being culturally biased.

If the NCAA fails to realize the importance of its power and the importance of treating each of its member institutions with equality, big-time intercollegiate athletics might come tumbling down around it. Ultimately, the NCAA could drown in the cesspool it helped create.

'Cat golfers 7th in opener

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State men's golf team opened the fall portion of its 1986-87 schedule with mixed results in the Kansas Invitational Monday and Tuesday at the Alvamar Country Club in Lawrence.

First-year coach Rob Sedorcek took his young squad, most of which were participating in their first collegiate tournament, to battle some of the Midwest's toughest competition.

The Wildcats finished seventh out of an eight-team field, but Sedorcek said he was not dissappointed in the team's play until the final round. K-State was only a couple of shots back of the fifth- and sixth-place teams after the first two rounds Monday.

"We kind of choked, to be quite blunt about it," Sedorcek said. "We were only 12 shots over with six holes to play (Tuesday) and we ended up 27 over."

Jeff Sedorcek, a freshman from Bishop Ward High School in Kansas City, Kan., paced the team with a 226 total for three rounds. Sedorcek ended the tournament in seventh place after ending Monday's first round in the fifth spot.

Missouri, Kansas, Wichita State, Colorado, Nebraska and Iowa State finished ahead of K-State. The squad's next action will be the Baker Invitational on Sept. 25 at Alvamar.

Due to a mistake in research, Gene Bartow was misidentified on Monday's sports page as the basketball coach at the University of North Carolina-Charlotte. He is the basketball coach at the University of Alabama-Birmingham.

New U.N. president calls for resolution to financial crisis

By The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The General Assembly opened its 41st session Tuesday and elected the foreign minister of Bangladesh to preside over a session preoccupied with financial problems.

Humayun Rasheed Choudhury, the new president, said his main goal is to guide through the assembly recommendations of a special committee on reforming the U.N. bureaucracy to resolve its fiscal crisis.

He said the recommendations could lead to "a rejuvenated United Nations with a fresh breath of confidence."

In his acceptance speech, Choudhury said, "The crisis if allowed to persist has the potential of crippling the organization to a point beyond recovery."

The United States is obliged under the U.N. Charter to pay an assessment voted by the majority of the 159-member Assembly. The assessment is currently 25 percent of the total budget, or $210 million.

Congress has mandated cuts in U.N. support, saying a dozen major donor nations providing most of the money are often outvoted on budget matters by a majority of 80 poor countries providing less than 1 percent of the funds.

Congressional cuts already passed or threatened could lead to the United States paying less than 10 percent of the U.N. budget and leaving the organization broke later this year.

Administration sources have said that they will resist most of the cuts and that U.N. action to reform itself will help its effort with Congress.

The U.N. expert committee, headed by Norwegian Ambassador Tom Vraalsen, has proposed a 15 percent cut in the U.N. staff and other moves to cut costs.

Other business before the Assembly, which will conclude its opening session near Christmas, is election of a Secretary-General. Choudhury, at a news conference, strongly endorsed the re-election of Javier Perez de Cuellar for a second five-year term.

The 66-year-old Peruvian diplomat, looking fit despite quadruple heart bypass surgery six weeks ago, is expected to be the overwhelming choice to succeed himself when his term runs out Dec. 31. The election is expected to be called for October and no vetoes are expected from any of the five permanent members of the Security Council who have the last say.

Wednesday the Assembly begins a scheduled three-day special session on South-West Africa or Namibia. More than 100 speakers have signed up to condemn South Africa for its control of the territory in defiance of the United Nations which has drawn up a plan for independence and elections.

Libya will ask that the world body condemn the United States for the April 15 raids on Libya, which U.S. leaders said were in retaliation for alleged terrorist acts sponsored by Moammar Gadhafi's government.

There will also be calls for withdrawal of Vietnamese troops from Cambodia and Soviet troops from Afghanistan; Iran and Iraq will be asked to end their six-year war, and dozens of resolutions will call for various forms of disarmament.

Next week, heads of states and other officials are to address the General Assembly.

Jobs

gram, the employing department pays 20 percent of the student's salary, and the federal government pays the remaining 80 percent.

Under the campus payroll program, the student's entire salary is paid by the employing department.

The federal funds for the work study program are not allocated to various departments but go into one main fund, Viterna said.

"The departments can list as many jobs as they want to in terms of what their budget allows," he said.

For this reason, campus departments tend to hire students on the work study program, if possible, to make their dollars go further, Viterna said.

Last year, about 900 students were on the work study payroll, said Larry Moeder, associate director of student financial assistance.

"As of right now, we have almost 700, but we're just barely into our first payroll period," Moeder said. "I think it's going to come out pretty close to 900, maybe around 825 by the time it's all over with."

Viterna said one of the reasons for fewer students being on the payroll now is because many turned in late applications that have yet to be considered.

The priority deadline for those applying for student financial assistance was March 15, he said. Those who had their applications in by that date and met eligibility requirements received a college work study award.

"We've had a lot of applications come in later, and as a result, we can't make any more awards," Viterna said. "What we have to do is wait until October, when we have an idea of who has accepted and who has not. Then we'll know how much more money we can award to students who qualify."

Viterna said if students who have received work study awards have not taken jobs by October, the awards will probably be given to someone else.

Average pay for those on the programs is "minimum (wage) or slightly higher," Viterna said.

Viterna didn't foresee any major changes in the amount of federal funding awarded for the work study program.

"We've been able to either maintain or increase the amounts of federal funding in the past few years," he said.

One of the biggest employers of K-State students is the Department of Housing. Its food service halls provide meals for dorm residents.

"We have openings in all three houses (food centers)," said John Pence, head of residence hall food services.

Pence, who runs Derby and Kramer Food Centers and Boyd Food Service, said he has advertised for workers for a week in the Collegian but still needs more help, particularly during the noon hour.

"We're trying to get students through work study, but there aren't enough to go around," Pence said.

Pence said he feels the reason the $3.35-an-hour food center jobs are not being applied for is not because students don't want to work there, but because they are trying to get through the first semester without having to work or because the jobs won't fit into their schedules.

Committee ponders hike in gas tax

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House Ways and Means Committee is considering a 10-cent-a-gallon increase in the federal gasoline tax as part of a package to reduce the fiscal 1987 deficit.

The tax-writing committee is considering the gas tax among several options designed to reduce red ink next year to avoid deep across-the-board spending cuts under the Gramm-Rudman law. A minimum of $9.4 billion in savings would be needed to avoid cuts twice that deep under the budget-balancing law.

By more than doubling the tax from its current 9 cents, the government would be able to raise $6.3 billion over a full year. If the gas tax increase were not implemented until January, as proposed, less would be gained in fiscal 1987, which begins Oct. 1.

The ways and means committee was working to find $6.3 billion in savings and other House committees were searching for another $4 billion. Among the other options was $2 billion from the sale of the Conrail freight railroad.

Talk of tax increases has become more widespread in Congress because, while most programs are being frozen or increased only to allow inflation, lawmakers have had little stomach for making spending cuts in an election year.

In addition, several billion dollars in new costs are on the horizon, including the drug-fighting bill passed by the House last week and continued attempts to save federal revenue-sharing, a politically popular program that sends checks to local governments.

Senate budget writers, trying to leave more room for the higher spending, were working on a $14 billion savings package, which did not include the gasoline tax but eyed sales of goverment assets, including Conrail.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., has been pushing for a $4-a-barrel oil import fee to protect domestic producers and raise about $5 billion a year. The oil levy would gain more revenue than a cigarette tax increase pending in the Senate, which leaders of both parties have been vying to kill to help their candidates in tobacco states, including those in the close North Carolina race for the Senate.

President Reagan has promised to veto any tax increases.

man of a House Post Office and Civil Service subcommittee on human resources, introduced legislation limiting drug testing to only those cases where there is reason to believe it is affecting an employee's job performance.

"The simple truth is that there is no evidence of drug abuse among federal workers," Ackerman said, calling the administration's demands for drug tests an "hysteria ... much like the loyalty oaths of the 1950s."

Rep. Patricia Schroder, D-Colo., who heads the House civil service subcommittee, said more than 1.3 million of the government's 2.8 million civilian workers could fall within the administration's criteria of holding sensitive jobs and thus be subjected to the mandatory tests.

Calling Reagan's order a public relations stunt and a "dumb idea," she estimated that testing all of them and trying to fire those who refuse to take the test or test positive will cost more than $300 million instead of the $56 million that the White House says the program will cost.

"For that amount of money," Schroeder said, "we could nearly double the size of the Drug Enforcement Administration or hire another 10,000 law enforcement agents."

However, Republican Reps. Clay Shaw of Florida and Dan Burton of California endorsed Reagan's program, saying the millions of dollars spent on a "supply-side" program to stop the flow of drugs to the user has clearly not worked.

"The focus has to shift to our own back yard, the demand side," Shaw said. "We are going to infringe on some people's rights. But let's not lose sight of our objective ... the elimination of drug use. The use of drug tests as a deterrent is the best place to begin the demand-side battle."

At the Pentagon, officials announced a series of steps to implement Reagan's program, saying the president's order for drug testing of key government workers will affect some 50,000 civilian Navy employees.

The Pentagon also said the U.S. military effort to bolster drug raids in Bolivia will be extended beyond the original scheduled two months.

said an alarm was sounded to evacuate the No. 2 shaft at the Kinross mine, 62 miles east of Johannesburg, when the fire broke out at 9:30 a.m.

Mine officials said there was an explosion in an acetylene welding torch or gas cylinder started the fire. The flames spread through electric cables and other material in a horizontal passage at the 15th level between the mine's two vertical shafts, they said.

Hill said the fumes "spread through the working areas of the No. 2 shaft," and he believed the fatal gases were carbon monoxide or carbon dioxide.

Miners normally do not wear gas masks underground, and Hill said he did not know if masks were available.

The worst accident at a gold mine in the past 10 years occurred in December 1978 when a fire broke out in the Vaal Reefs Gold Mine, trapping and killing 41 miners.

Senate grants Rehnquist's approval

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate, after three months of divisive debate over William H. Rehnquist's integrity and commitment to equal rights, confirmed him as the nation's 16th chief justice Wednesday.

By a 65-33 vote, the Senate approved President Reagan's elevation of Rehnquist, the Supreme Court's most politically conservative member for nearly 15 years. He replaces retiring Chief Justice Warren E. Burger.

The Senate then immediately confirmed, by a 98-0 vote, the nomination of Antonin Scalia, a federal appeals court judge, to fill the Supreme Court vacancy created by Burger's departure.

Only two of the Senate's 53 Republicans, Lowell Weicker of Connecticut and Charles Mathias of Maryland, voted against the Rehnquist nomination.

Earlier, Republicans were successful in curtailing the debate in a 68-31 procedural vote, paving the way to the final vote hours later.

Rehnquist, in a brief encounter with reporters Wednesday evening, was asked if he thought the advise-and-consent process had been arduous.

"From my point of view, it has," he replied.

As chief justice, Rehnquist would serve as the nation's top judge and the "first among equals" on the Supreme Court.

As the speech-making wound down Wednesday, Sen. Charles Mathias of Maryland became the second Republican to announce his opposition to Rehnquist.

"I can no longer cast my vote in favor of his confirmation," said Mathias, who previously supported the nomination. "I am sufficiently troubled by the real possibility that he acted improperly in failing to (disqualify) himself" in a 1972 Supreme Court decision upholding a domestic wiretapping program Rehnquist helped establish as a government lawyer.

Mathias' vote bolstered Democratic claims that opposition to Rehnquist was not based purely on partisan politics.

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, previously had rebutted Republican claims that opponents of Rehnquist's nomination were trying to remake the 1984 presidential elections. He noted the Senate approved Reagan's only other Supreme Court nomination, that of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor in 1981, by a 99-0 vote.

Despite heated hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Rehnquist's nomination was sent on to the Senate last month by a 13-5 vote of the panel.

Democrats attacked him as insensitive toward minorities and women and contended that he has a too-narrow view of individual rights.

They disclosed that the deed of Rehnquist's summer home in Greensboro, Vt., contains a restrictive covenant barring its sale to

From Staff and Wire Reports

Al Alsobrook, vice president of university relations on the Gainesville campus, was notified of Travis' decision Tuesday night.

"I'm out of it," Travis said. "My goals are to win at Kansas State. I just feel it would be best to stay here and fulfill the commitments I made to Stan (Parrish) and Lon (Kruger)."

Travis said he made the decision after the Wildcat football team lost 17-0 to Northern Iowa Saturday.

"Kansas State had made a commitment when they hired me, and I didn't feel it was right to leave and not be able to fulfill the goals I had set for myself," he said.

Travis was considered Florida's No. 1 choice for the position, according to the Jacksonville Times-Union, based on the fact that he is the only candidate who is an alumnus. Travis graduated from Florida in 1963 and received a master's degree from there in 1969.

He also was an All-Southeastern Conference guard for the Gators' football team in 1962.

Travis spent two days in Gainesville being interviewed for the job in late August, but said when he returned that he didn't plan to leave K-State.

A search committee recommended to the University of Florida President's office Tuesday that the search continue for a replacement to the retiring AD, Bill Carr, who is slated to leave in early October.

"The committee made no recommendation...but they wanted it made clear that they did not reject anybody," Alsobrook said.

When Alsobrook notified Travis of the committee's decision not to name a prospective AD, Travis withdrew his name from consideration.

According to the Times-Union, the French capital hit by terrorist bomb

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Terrorists struck the French capital Wednesday for the fifth time in 10 days, demolishing a clothing store with a bomb thrown from a car. Five people were killed and 58 injured, authorities said.

Three people were killed and more than 100 injured in the previous bombings, which prompted the government to adopt tough anti-terrorist measures. Two groups seeking to free three imprisoned Middle Easterners have issued conflicting claims of responsibility for those attacks.

One woman passer-by was blown apart by Wednesday's blast in central Paris, and a witness said another victim was lifted several yards into the air.

"It is an incredible sight, many women, children, blood everywhere," said a witness who refused to give his name.

The bomb was tossed from a black BMW carrying two mustachioed men, one of whom rolled down the window and tossed the bomb at the Tati clothing and textile store in the Montparnasse district, said Laurent Davenas, an assistant state prosecutor.

Windows were blown out of several businesses. The sidewalk in front of the Tati store was covered with glass, debris and bleeding victims, many crying out for help. Police cleared a plaza, the Place du 18 Juin, and used it as a helicopter landing pad to evacuate those with the gravest injuries.

A spokesman for the public hospital authority said 19 of those injured in the 5:25 p.m. bombing were in serious condition.

"The most seriously wounded were treated on the sidewalk in front of Tati," said one witness. "I saw people dying."

"It was horrible," said another witness. "A young woman, her legs cut, had half of her face torn off. All you could see was bleeding bodies."

Premier Jacques Chirac called an

Terry Campbell, assistant professor of surgery and medicine, draws blood Wednesday from a great horned owl to test for internal injuries. The bird was taken to the Veterinary Medicine Center by Jeanne Elliott, Manhattan, after it accidentally flew into the grill of a friend's car last week. The owl, which was removed from the grill at the vet med center, appears to be in good condition and may be released as soon as next week.

State picks local man for ag post

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The State Board of Agriculture will name Samuel D. Brownback, a young Manhattan attorney, as the new state secretary of agriculture today, the Associated Press learned Wednesday.

Floyd Coen of Elkhart, president of the board, scheduled a news conference for 9:30 a.m. today at the Department of Agriculture office here to announce the selection.

While Coen claimed Wednesday it was premature to say the board has hired Brownback, AP learned that a board member, Charles Hamon of Valley Falls, made an appointment to introduce Brownback to Gov. John Carlin at 8:15 a.m. today, ahead of the announcement.

While the governor has no say in who the board hires as its secretary, it is customary for the nominee to be introduced to the governor before of his formal appointment.

"I really can't confirm it, and I can't comment on it," Coen said in a telephone interview Wednesday. "It's not final yet. It's just a little bit premature."

Coen said a three-member committee of the Board of Agriculture would meet in Topeka this morning "to finalize it all," ahead of the news conference.

However, he confirmed the board already "has done some voting" on the selection of a new secretary. Sources said the decision to hire Brownback was made last weekend.

Brownback, will succeed Harland Priddle, who resigned as agriculture secretary in June to run for lieutenant governor with Jack Brier, who failed in his bid for the Republican governor nomination in the August primary election.

Don Jacka, assistant agriculture secretary, has been acting secretary since Priddle's resignation.

Brownback could not be reached for comment Wednesday.

Sources said the final choice apparently was between Brownback and Doyle Talkington, former executive vice president of the Kansas Pork Producers Council who has been in Washington the past nearly three years with the National Pork Producers Council.

Brownback is a practicing attorney in Manhattan in the law firm headed by former state Rep. John F. Stites, R-Manhattan. State Rep. Joe Knopp, R-Manhattan, recently joined that law firm.

Lower gasoline prices fuel profit losses for local distributers

By MARTA MONTGOMERY
Collegian Reporter

In 1984, Jerry Unterberger, owner and manager of Jerry's Getty Auto & Wrecker, 1531 Poyntz Ave., said he was charging as much as $1.30 a gallon for gasoline. Today, his signs read 85 cents a gallon.

The inability of the Oil Producing Export Countries to agree on a set price for their crude oil has lowered gasoline prices throughout the country. The average motorist sees the OPEC disorganization as a blessing.

However, some industries heavily dependent on gasoline don't view the situation in the same positive manner.

Profits at some local gas stations are decreasing because of the lower prices, said Joe Ziebert, manager of Westside Standard, 3001 Anderson Ave. He said stations are supplied with gas by a local company that charges a rate dependent on the price of crude oil. There is no way to know what the price of gasoline will be until the price of crude oil is set, Ziebert said.

"We go with whatever we can buy it for and whatever we can sell it for — to still make a little money," he said. "As long as we stay competitive, it doesn't make much difference as far as gallonage goes."

However, Unterberger said the overall price change has not had a major effect on his business. This is because he maintains a consistent markup rate, or percentage of profit, on each gallon of gasoline he sells.

He said in one way the price drop has helped his business because people are finding it more economical to drive now that prices are lower.

The price change also has effects that reach outside of the oil industry. The transportation industry is an example.

Nikki Reagor, manager of the Greyhound Bus Lines in Manhattan, said the industry is down everywhere, not only in Kansas.

People are driving more today because they find it less expensive than traveling by bus, Reagor said. To compensate for this, Greyhound has developed a promotion comparable to one the airlines run. By purchasing a ticket more than 30 days prior to the departure date, travelers can find substantial savings.

Reagor said this offer may not have much effect locally, but she expects it to be a profit-booster in the metropolitan areas.

The effects of the lower prices are varied within the oil industry. Robert Barancik, tank car manager for the Mobil Oil Corp. in Kansas City, said those oilmen who are in the business of buying and selling — but not drilling — generally are not suffering as much as the independents who drill for oil and then try to compete with the low prices OPEC is charging for crude oil.

If the price goes so low that it becomes impossible for Kansans to continue to drill, the state, as well as

Rocket carries satellite into orbit

VANDENBERG AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — A $37.3 million weather satellite whose launch had been delayed 16 times was carried into orbit by a rebuilt 25-year-old rocket Wednesday, the second successful launch in two weeks for the nation's troubled space program.

A crowd of 120 Air Force and NASA officials and contractors cheered as the 94-foot-tall Atlas E rocket blasted off at 8:52 a.m., from Space Launch Complex-3, carrying the RCA-built NOAA-G satellite into a 518-mile-high polar orbit.

"We have liftoff," the flight commentator said as the rocket, spewing bright orange flames into a thick cloud cover, vanished into the clouds above the base 140 miles northwest of Los Angeles.

Placement in orbit was announced at 10:07 a.m.

"I have goose bumps, just like everyone else," said Julie Andrews, spokeswoman for General Dynamics, which built the booster in 1961 as an intercontinental ballistic missile and refurbished it to launch the satellite.

Casino strike in Atlantic City ends

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — A violent, 35-hour strike by 13,000 casino employees ended Wednesday when negotiators reached a settlement and sent workers back to their sinks, bars, stoves and brooms in seven gaming halls.

Police said 33 people had been arrested and 54 people injured, including two who were hospitalized in stable condition with head injuries.

Mobs that apparently included strikers and juveniles threw rocks and bottles through casino windows, blocked traffic and disabled vehicles, and tossed eggs at gamblers after the walkout began at midnight Monday.

Negotiations, which reached an impasse late last week, had resumed Tuesday night under federal court order after striking workers were called off picket lines by union President Roy Silbert in an effort to quell the unrest.

Union and casino officials said workers began returning to their jobs immediately after the agreement was approved by the union's 99-member negotiating committee and shop stewards at midmorning Wednesday.

Brokaw continues West Coast tour

Brokaw, who is working his way from Seattle to Los Angeles in a Pacific Coast tour of the "NBC Nightly News," also broadcast Tuesday's newscast from San Francisco.

Brokaw said the difference between entertainment and news is a major issue in television journalism. Although he admitted that part of his job requires "engaging people," the nation's No. 2 anchor said that "does not make me a song-and-dance man."

Dodge receives public works grant

TOPEKA — Sen. Bob Dole announced today that Dodge City will receive a $500,000 federal public works grant to help develop a 226-acre industrial park.

It will help build water and sewer facilities as well as access roads to the Dodge City industrial park.

"These funds are extremely important for the economic development of Dodge City," Dole said in a statement issued through his Topeka office. "The improvements to this industrial park will go a long way toward attracting new jobs and industry not only to Dodge City, but to all of Ford County as well."

Dole said he was able last year to get language into a bill which gave rural areas priority consideration for the economic development grants.

Church hospitals merge into center

SALINA — A Methodist and a Roman Catholic hospital have agreed to merge into a single organization affiliated with both churches, officials announced Tuesday.

The Catholic St. John's and the Methodist Asbury hospital will keep their names, but become branches of Salina Regional Medical Center, a locally owned and operated corporation that will run both of them.

By pooling resources, the two hospitals can stay competitive and offer more services to Salina and surrounding rural areas, said Tom Kennedy, chairman of St. John's board of trustees.

The two hospitals have discussed a merger for 10 years, during which time they have combined some departments and arranged to share major pieces of equipment.

Asbury, with 200 beds and 620 employees, has specialized in in major bone surgery, mental health and obstetrics. St. John's, with 173 beds and 500 employees, has specialized in the treatment of chemical dependency, eye surgery and cancer treatment.

Court rules against KU professor

TOPEKA — The University of Kansas did not discriminate against anthropology professor Dorothy Willner by paying her less than male faculty, a federal judge ruled Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Richard Rogers said university officials set Willner's salary according to "equal and fair standards" and he harshly criticized the professor for her conduct during the three-week trial, at which she acted as her own attorney.

"The plaintiff here was rude and abusive to the court and to witnesses, was disruptive during the court proceedings and was repeatedly late for court despite stern warnings," Rogers said.

Twice during the trial, Willner lay down on the courtroom floor and she openly argued with the judge, who called the trial "the worst experienced by the court in 11 years on the bench."

In her sexual discrimination lawsuit, Willner claims she was paid less than her male counterparts and was retaliated against when she filed complaints with civil rights agencies.

Marketing club program wins honors

Students show campaign to executives

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

Most students don't expect to present a marketing campaign to upper management until after graduation. That is, unless they are a member of the National Agri-Marketing Association.

K-State's NAMA team was invited to repeat its high-ranking program before a select group of marketing executives at Monsanto Agricultural Company this summer.

"We realized this was a very special invitation," said John Riley, assistant director of resident instruction and the NAMA chapter adviser.

"Monsanto's marketing director saw things in our presentation that he felt would benefit his people," Riley said. "They even had a representative from their New York advertising agency in the audience."

The eight-member team from K-State won second place in the marketing competition at the NAMA conference in Dallas. The top two teams presented their 20-minute programs for the entire delegation, Riley said.

"We were nervous because these were marketing professionals who do this every day," said team member Wally Brockhoff, junior in agricultural economics. "They asked us some good questions to see if we really knew what we were talking about."

Student teams from 22 colleges and universities participated in the NAMA contest. The teams devised and presented marketing programs for fictional products.

"Our product was a new premium sorghum seed plus safener called Select," Brockhoff said. Seed safener is a chemical that protects seeds from herbicides.

The group formulated its product idea by February and then began the background research.

"We had to define the product in a competitive market, define and analyze our regional target market, formulate the entire marketing plan and develop a means for evaluation," Brockhoff said.

The team chose to include telemarketing in its program and used ads that featured a toll-free number.

"We did a lot of work on the written proposal, but I felt that our strongest point was our presentation," Brockhoff said. "Our slides were done by the Media Center in Bluemont Hall, and we were even complimented by professionals on their quality."

Group members met once or twice a week to prepare for the contest, and each received one hour of credit. They logged between 1,500 and 2,000 hours in preparation time, Brockhoff said.

"NAMA is open to any student interested and willing to make the time commitment," Riley said. "We're a broad-based organization dealing with all phases of marketing: sales, public relations, advertising and journalism."

"Our strongest facet is that close communication with professionals that enables us to be more familiar with their jobs," Brockhoff said.

Through the "mentor" program, students are paired with a professional for a day to learn more about that job, Riley said.

Jim Robertson, marketing director with Monsanto, will be the featured speaker at the next NAMA meeting on Sept. 23.

Local groups support Big Lakes cutathon

By AMY PETRY
Collegian Reporter

Big Lakes Developmental Center Inc., 1500 Hayes Drive, is holding its second annual Cutathon in cooperation with Hair Experts, 1209 Moro St.

Proceeds from the event will go to the center, which serves developmentally disabled children and adults in the Riley County area. The center serves Geary, Clay, Pottawatomie and Riley counties, said Janice Pankratz, community relations coordinator for the center.

The Cutathon is sponsored by Kappa Delta and Pi Beta Phi sororities, the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity and KQLA-FM, said Jim Ward, stylist and part owner of Hair Experts.

Ward, who has been with Hair Experts for 13 years, had his first Cutathon in 1974. It lasted 24 hours.

"I'm the original Cutathon creator," he said.

The Cutathon will be from 9 a.m. to 11 p.m. Friday. Haircuts will be $10 and people can call for an appointment, walk in or drop by to leave donations, he said.

"There will be a half hour allotted for each haircut," Ward said. "We will work with facial features."

Each person's haircut will be designed to accent a person's positive facial qualities, determined by their bone structure.

"You will receive a quality cut." Ward said.

Hair Expert employees have volunteered their time to do the cutting, and fraternity and sorority volunteers are in charge of shampoos and sweep-ups, he said.

Pankratz said last year's Cutathon raised $1,800. This year the goal was increased to $2,500 because the Cutathon is two hours longer, she said.

"Each year we will be adding a couple of hours until we reach 24 hours," Pankratz said.

Throughout the day, there will be drawings every hour for door prizes, bands will perform, and food and drinks will be sold, Ward said.

Big Lakes, a community-based, non-profit agency, has been in the Manhattan area for 14 years. Its programs include three preschools, two adult training centers and residential, duplex and apartment programs, she said.

Federal cutbacks have been made, so much of the proceeds from the Cutathon will go to the general budget. Other portions of the proceeds will be set aside for a group home for women that the center is planning to build, Pankratz said.

Reagan gives assistance to Philippines

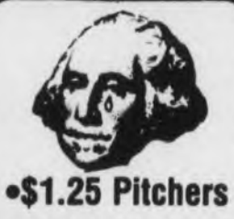
By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Proclaiming himself "bullish on the Philippines," President Reagan on Wednesday gave President Corazon Aquino another installment in money the United States has promised for her struggling government.

Reagan challenged the leaders of America's businesses to back up the U.S. government's show of confidence with private investment dollars.

Aquino, meeting Reagan for the first time since assuming office in February, told the American chief executive, "I hope you have set the tone and direction for a new relationship."

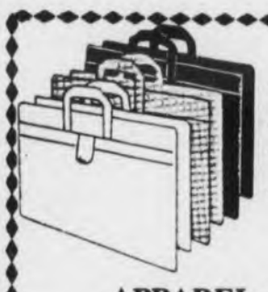
Anti-Aquino demonstrators outside the White House fence shouted such slogans as "Cory is a Communist" while Reagan and Aquino said their public farewells at a departure ceremony. The two heads-of-state seemed oblivious to the goings-on.



The ceremony took place only a few yards from the South Lawn of the White House, where Reagan, on Sept. 16, 1982, praised then-President Ferdinand E. Marcos as "a respected voice for reason and moderation."

Marcos fled from Manila seven months ago after he lost a presidential election to Aquino, widow of opposition leader Benigno Aquino. Marcos, his family and closest associates have since been living in Hawaii.

In Wednesday's ceremony, Reagan said, "Governments, businesses, financial institutions and individuals are dealing with a new kind of government in the Philippines."



An administration official said the aid consisted of $100 million in economic and $50 million in military aid, both approved earlier by Congress, and $10 million in emergency medical assistance which will be matched by another $10 million from Americares, a private organization.

Space program needs to acquire credibility

President Reagan promised the United States and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration a new space shuttle to replace Challenger, and NASA chief James Fletcher is asking for yet another to bring the total number of shuttles to five.

But first, NASA and the shuttle program need to prove they can be reliable and fulfill the objectives promised when the reusable spacecraft was proposed — regular launch schedules, less expense and safe missions.

Before spending $2.8 billion for a new orbiter, the space program needs to know where it is going in the future.

In an Aug. 19 letter, NASA's independent advisory council expressed "great concern" about America's ability to maintain its leadership in space because of the absence of long-term goals to guide the program.

Furthermore, NASA must act on the recommendations of the Rogers commission, the group that investigated the Challenger disaster, before asking for more shuttles.

For the space program to continue its missions and prove it is successful at meeting its objectives, a fourth shuttle is essential.

U.S. News & World Report stated that even with four shuttles, NASA will be hard pressed to conduct key programs — namely the building of a space station. Because the replacement shuttle will take about four years to complete, it is necessary to begin its construction now for it to be ready when shuttle flights resume.

In the meantime, or at least until NASA can prove its dependability, the space program may have to make use of cheaper methods of launching satellites and other spacecraft that don't require humans to be on board. Reagan, upon the advice of the Rogers commission, opened the door to private enterprise to take part in putting more reliability back into the use of expendable rockets.

When shuttle operations become more reliable with regular launch schedules, successful missions and less chance of disaster — and if our country's goals for the future in space demonstrate the need — a fifth shuttle will be appropriate. Until then, no more than four are necessary.

Europe should unify against South Africa

The United States and nations in the European Community must make sacrifices if sanctions against South Africa are to carry any weight.

Tuesday, the European Community adopted limited sanctions against South Africa that did not include banning imports of coal. The commonwealth nations did agree to ban imports of South African iron, steel and gold coins, as well as banning new investments in South Africa.

Banning coal would have been a far more serious threat to South Africa than banning iron and steel. Last year, the 12 European nations imported $1.27 billion in coal and $424 million in iron and steel — a difference of $846 million.

Banning coal would have had more than twice the impact on South Africa's economy. A majority of the nations in the community supported banning coal, but the ban was opposed by West Germany and Portugal.

West Germany was hesitant to agree to any sanctions, but in the interest of unity complied with the four sanctions. It is unfortunate West Germany could not give up coal imports to send a strong, uncompromising message to the Botha regime.

The current agreement more resembles a token measure to show that Europe is still interested in human rights. It is not a forceful, effective protest against South Africa's policy of apartheid.

In reaction to the community's mild sanctions, South African Foreign Minister R.F. Botha said South Africa would not impose measures to retaliate. In other words, the punishment wasn't enough to merit a reaction.

If President Reagan vetoes a legislative proposal for sanctions, Congress must unify in a way that the European Community did not and overrule the veto. The United States must take a definitive stand against apartheid, even if sacrifices are necessary.

Falwell shows prejudice, hypocrisy

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

Few people were surprised Sept. 11 when former President Jimmy Carter spoke out against Jerry Falwell; animosity between the two dates back to Carter's administration when Falwell claimed Carter, a fellow Baptist, was not a Christian because he favored the SALT II arms limitations and the Panama Canal Treaty.

What surprised some, however, was the former president's choice of words. He said, "In a very Christian way, as far as I am concerned, he (Falwell) can go to hell." Such words are rarely used by public figures when discussing political differences, and certainly not religious differences.

But as Carter and others have discovered, Falwell and his Moral Majority Inc. (by raking in more than $1 million a month, it managed to become a corporation) rarely employ orthodox debate methods — especially when politics and religion are the subjects under debate. Many politicians have become fed up with the "bullying" tactics of the so-called "religious right." Falwell, for example, believes in strict Biblical fundamentalism and, thus, sees every issue as clearly right and wrong or Christian and anti-Christian.

Falwell's Moral Majority and other groups with similar ideologies have denounced various leaders as being anti-Christian when their political views differ.

Prior to the 1980 presidential campaign, the Moral Majority sponsored a series of television advertisements in which Carter, who was in favor of the Equal Rights Amendment, was portrayed as catering exclusively to the demands of homosexuals.

Falwell, who supported Anita Bryant's anti-homosexual campaign in 1977, a campaign that called for the death penalty for homosexuality, has said, "Homosexuals are people blinded by Satan." Interestingly enough, however, some of the leaders and former leaders in the "religious right," the same people responsible for the creation of Moral Majority, are themselves homosexuals.

Former Rep. Robert Bauman, R-Md., the former chairman of the American Conservative Union and a one-time friend of Falwell, resigned his positions after being accused "of paying a 16-year-old boy $50 to perform an oral sex act." Falwell, of course, denied ever having spoken with Bauman, despite records that prove otherwise. Prior to his resignation, Bauman had sponsored a bill that condemned homosexuality as "an unacceptable lifestyle."

As leader of the National Conservative Political Action Committee, John Terry Dolan was another long-time associate of Falwell and a homosexual. In fact, according to Perry Young, author of the book, "God's Bullies," many members of the new-right leadership are homosexuals even though the groups to which they belong are vehemently opposed to homosexuality.

If hypocrisy seems to be a key element in the "religious right," then it's by no means limited to the issue of homosexuality.

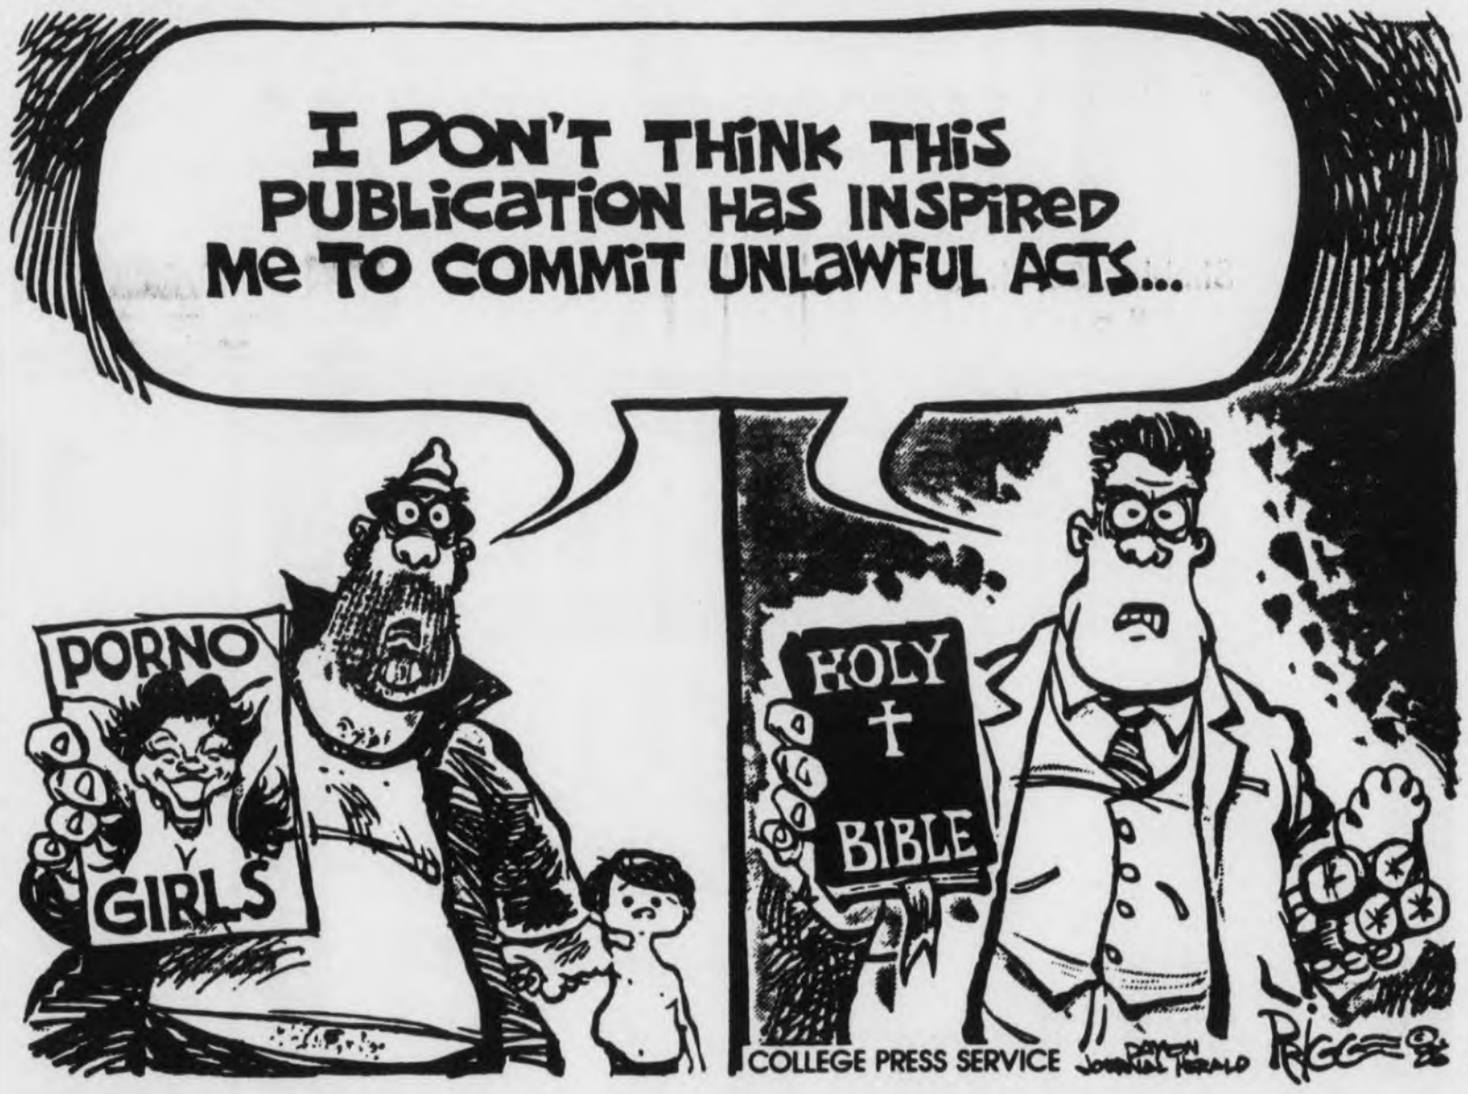
In a 1965 sermon titled "Ministers and Marches," Falwell argued that religious leaders should refrain from taking part in politics: "We are not told (by the Bible) to wage wars agaist bootleggers, liquor stores, gamblers, murderers, prostitutes, racketeers, prejudiced persons or institutions..." Today, however, the God-fearing preacher feels justified in waging a "holy crusade agaist militant gays, ultra-liberals, athiests, porno pushers and humanists."

In light of his current activism, "Ministers and Marches" clearly demonstrates Falwell's hypocrisy. But something else becomes evident when the sermon is examined in its original 1965 setting — Falwell is a racist.

Falwell was doing what he could to keep religious leaders such as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. out of politics because they were making progress in the civil rights movement. During the sermon he said, "I do question the sincerity and non-violent nature of some civil rights leaders such as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Mr. James Farmer, and others, who are known to have left-wing associations."

Falwell admitted later that he was a segregationist until 1964 when he became "...spiritually developed and matured." When Falwell opened the Lynchburg Christian Academy in 1967, however, he refused to admit blacks until well into the 1970s. When Falwell went to South Africa in 1985, he proclaimed that things really aren't that bad.

In 1981, Falwell said, "There is no question there are anti-Semitics (I assume he meant anti-Semites) in this country. But only God Almighty can cure that and we're not going to get all that straight until we get to heaven, except through preaching and praying and living the example."



So the same Baptist warrior who declared, "a holy war, a holy crusade against the moral cancers that are threatening to destroy the...nation," was content to let God lead the fight against racism. The fact is, Falwell was a racist during the 1960s and remains one today.

Thus far, I've referred to Moral Majority Inc. as being an element of the "religious right." However, in fairness I should mention that some of Falwell's extremism is so far out that many conservatives refuse to acknowledge him as one of their ranks.

Syndicated columnist James Kilpatrick, a staunch conservative, butted heads with the Moral Majority over who should control education: "I somehow doubt that God opposes the Department of Education. If God had wanted to destroy the Department of Education, God would have switched three votes in July 1979 when the bill passed the House by 210 to 206."

Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., the conservative's conservative for years, has unequivocally voiced his opinion of Falwell: "I think every good Christian ought to kick Jerry Falwell's ass."

The truth is, Falwell and the so-called "religious right" have little to do with any respectable politics — liberal or conservative.

Spectators incredible

Editor,

Incredible. To the students that were present at the end of the K-State-Northern Iowa football game, I have to admit, you were incredible.

Being involved in the KSU Marching Band is a lot of work. It takes time and patience. And for only one credit hour, you may wonder why we do it.

It sounds crazy, but we do it because we love it.

When the students joined with us Saturday, it was a time many of the band members will never forget. You see, that's our goal — to entertain — to get you involved along with us.

Thanks, students. You make it worthwhile for us, and believe me, there's more to come.

Team needs optimism

Editor,

Writing this letter would have been much easier two weeks ago after the euphoria of a convincing football win. However, it likely would have lacked some of this perspective that real school spirit and pride must be deeper than the football team's fortunes.

As an inveterate fan of 17 seasons, I am among those that hoped Coach Stan Parrish was a miracle worker who could take the dedicated, hard-working core of last year's team and, with a few choice freshmen and transfer recruits, parlay them into a disciplined unit where determination and a resurgence in Purple Pride would win the day and several games, too. Folks, it doesn't seem to be that easy.

The challenge now is to not let that minor detour in our morale overshadow all else in our collective K-State futures.

If our morale is that mercurial, how can we expect young male students, 18 to 22, who prepare hard to play competitive football and then see some of their hopes dashed, to respond?

Part of their future perspective on football and life will be related to our long-term attitudes. I could probably be as cynical as anyone, but that doesn't get us anywhere. This black humor of waiting for something to go wrong and saying "I told you so" will be endemic if we let it be.

As fans, let's set ourselves the goal of being the most courageous, dedicated persistent Purple Pride pushers this planet has ever seen. Hasn't it been wonderful to see more purple around this fall and feel the enthusiasm that spirit has rekindled? Those with long memories may remember Vince Gibson's first year was crowned with only an opening game win. We still have eight games to improve upon that record.

It's likely the team and coaches' attitudes will somewhat reflect ours. Do we want the outcomes of our present attitude or do we want better outcomes? To the extent our attitudes affect morale, we influence some outcomes. It is certain nothing better will occur than our attitudes allow over the long-term.

Parrish and crew have set some lofty, yet attainable goals if we believe in them and help.

I am proud of the many student, faculty, alumni and townspeople who attended the first two home games. The band and student section came to have fun and kept their enthusiam to the end, so we know it can be done.

Let's weather this one together, remove the gloom, and help restore the sunshine over KSU Stadium. If this sounds excessively optimistic, it probably is. But I don't like the morbid alternatives.

For those faculty and students who are not football fans and may be turned off by this verbiage, be patient. Other issues shall be addressed in ensuing months, but this one seemed appropriate this week.

Board advises students, faculty on consumer-related issues

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

The University has a place to turn for consumers with problems such as mail-order fraud, landlord/tenant relations, door-to-door salesmen, automobile repair, credit and insurance.

The Consumer Relations Board is here to help.

"CRB exists to advise students, faculty and community residents on consumer problems," said Kelli Carr, consumer relations board director and senior in journalism and mass communications. "The service is mainly used by students who are aware of its existence."

Carr said about 90 percent of the cases are landlord/tenant problems. Problems with security deposits, insurance, roommates or a landlord who will not make necessary repairs are common.

The other most common cases usually deal with mail-order problems in which an ordered package never arrives or arrives damaged.

The main purpose of CRB is not only to advise consumers with problems but to educate and provide information for consumers in helping them make good decisions, Carr said.

"Our success rate is about 90 percent," she said. "Cases not solved are usually due to lack of interest by the complainant."

The case procedure CRB follows involves six steps, she said. First, it is determined whether the consumer has made an attempt to resolve the problem. If so, CRB suggests different ways to handle the situation and provides information necessary for the consumer to follow through on the alternative chosen.

Second, if resolution of the problem is unsuccessful, CRB evaluates the complaint and investigates to try and obtain a voluntary settlement.

Third, the consumer fills out a complaint form, which is then sent to the business in question. In turn, the business has 10 days to reply stating their side of the story and suggestions they have to resolve the problem.

The fourth and fifth steps involve CRB's evaluation of the reply to see if further action is merited. If no reply is received from the business, a follow-up letter is sent, Carr said.

CRB may suggest the complainant contact the business or refer the complaint to the proper agency.

The final step, done when a voluntary settlement cannot be obtained, is for CRB to notify the state attorney general's office, the postal inspector, the applicable federal regulatory agency or a trade agency, Carr said.

CRB also can assist the consumer in getting ready for small claims court.

Although CRB can and has gone through all six steps in some cases, most are settled before court action is taken, Carr said.

As the director, Carr has many duties but works mainly as the liasion between businesses and consumers. She was appointed director for this year by the Student Senate last spring.

The board's employees are volunteers and students enrolled in the Consumer Relations Practicum. CRB works with the Manhattan Consumer-Business Relations Center, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, the Riley County attorney's office and the Kansas attorney general's office.

For more information on obtaining help of getting involved in CRB, pamphlets are available in the Student Government Services office in the Union.

S. African mine fire kills 177

By The Associated Press

EVANDER, South Africa — Weary rescue crews on Wednesday collected the bodies of miners sprawled along a mile-deep shaft that a raging fire turned into a death trap for at least 177 men. It was South Africa's worst gold mine disaster.

Five miners still were missing and believed dead after the Tuesday fire at Kinross Gold Mine released lethal clouds of chemical fumes in the No. 2 shaft where about 2,400 men were working.

Survivors told of being trapped, unable to breath, of clouds of smoke and of their desperation as they watched their friends fall dead. "Only about seven of us made it to the surface," said Komiti Mmereko, a black driller with one mining crew.

Officials said 235 of the miners were hospitalized with burns, injuries and chest pains from inhaling the fumes that filled the mine after a fire was accidentally started by a welding machine.

The miners "didn't stand a chance," according to Dick Grenfell, a 38-year-old Briton who survived the fire. "They just ran into a wall of smoke and must have dropped like flies."

Most of South Africa's miners are black and the union representing black miners called the accident "a clear indictment of the industry." A statement said, "It has required tragedy after tragedy and the loss of many lives before the industry and government pay attention to safety standards."

Most of the bodies were found along a mile-long horizontal tunnel, some in groups and some alone — men who perished as they frantically sought a way out.

"The smoke started coming in. Then the oxygen was gone. I couldn't breathe," said Bedron Siphoso from his bed at the Winkelhaak Mine Hospital.

He said he fainted and when he came to, "I saw many of the others were dead." Rescue crews saved him.

Trucks drove in and out of the mine compound, and men with hoses washed dust from the hoist cage that brought bodies to the surface.

Jacobus Olivier, general manager of the mine 62 miles southeast of Johannesburg, gave the official casualty figures. He said that of the dead, five were white and 172 were black migrant workers from tribal homelands and neighboring black countries.

He said government engineers were removing samples of the materials that had burned in the fire to determine which one spewed the killer gases. Olivier said the source could have been a polyurethane foam used to help seal structural bracing in the tunnels.

Workers were welding a broken rail used by small trains to transport ore when the fire broke out. Olivier said an acetylene gas cylinder caught fire, and the blaze spread to the walls covered with the polyurethane foam.

The fumes killed all the victims, he said.

By STEVE BRADY
Collegian Reporter

University students have helped Pizza Hut Inc. develop what they hope is a new system to make dough rise and then stop rising all in the same unit.

Mark Cloutier, senior in mechanical engineering, along with Denise Bannister, Dana Gruenbacher, and Daniel Mills, fall 1985 mechanical engineering graduates, have come up with an idea that they hope will impress Pizza Hut officials enough to market it.

The four were part of a class project for Mechanical Engineering Design Lab, a required class for all mechanical engineering students. The class invites different companies to come to campus and share some of their problems. The class is divided into groups of four. Each group is given a problem to solve by one of the companies.

Pizza Hut presented the problem of needing a way to proof dough (make it rise) and make it retard (stop rising), all in the same unit.

The problem with the proofing and retarding machines was that pizzas are stacked seven high, with the pizzas on the top and bottom getting more heat. This caused the pizza to sink in the middle and to raise higher on the sides.

"They wanted a more consistent product," Cloutier said.

The Pizza Hut officials who came to campus discussed the marketing, design and feasibility aspects of the project. The group was given $500 for any expenses, such as phone calls or travel expenses, he said.

Cloutier said the Pizza Hut officials came in with the attitude that this would be a professional project, and they wanted it to be carried out in a professional manner.

"Our main problem was that we were given an idea, but we had only so long to work on it," Cloutier said.

The group finally came up with a solution for the problem. Cloutier said he could not reveal the facts or the specifics of the solution, but said they were successful in combining the proofer and retarder into one cabinet.

After becoming convinced their idea would work, the group presented its solution to Pizza Hut Inc. in Wichita. Cloutier said the company, which was impressed with the solution, will put the group's names on the patent if it decides to market the new product.

Farm foreclosures could result in serious tax implications

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

Prolonged financial pressure in the agriculture industry continues to push some operators to reduce or liquidate their farm businesses.

There is more than one way to do so, but knowing which is best is not always easy. Allowing creditors to foreclose on a farm, as opposed to declaring bankruptcy, can have serious tax implications, said Douglas F. Beech, instructor of agriculture economics.

"A farmer should always seek competent tax advice before assets are sold or transferred, when it is still possible to do adequate tax planning," Beech said.

Sam Brownback, agriculture law specialist for the Division of Cooperative Extension, said Senate Bill 696, usually referred to as the Family Farm Rehabilitation Act, substantially affects the dealings of farm borrowers and lenders when the loan payments are overdue to the point where foreclosure is likely.

"The act allows an insolvent farmer to continue farming the land and using the equipment which he has for three years after the matter is in foreclosure, if he pays to the court, in advance, the interest on the property retained," Brownback said. "The interest will be at U.S. Treasury bill rates plus 2 percent and is figured on the fair market value of the property that is retained."

The U.S. Department of Agriculture has said 70 percent of all farmers in the country are experiencing "negative cash flow," he said.

Bill Webber, Manhattan district director for Farmers Home Administration, said every individual farmer has a different situation. He said while FmHA has guidelines from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, it also works with the individual more closely than any bank can afford to do.

"Even though we are referred to as a 'lender of last resort,' 65 percent to 70 percent of our farmers our in good shape financially," he said. "Lender of last resort means that we often take on clients who cannot get credit elsewhere."

Much has been done through legislation to help the farmer with the problem of taxable income being generated by the sale of their property to avoid foreclosure, he said.

"Farmers turning their land back to the government and then getting hit with the tax bill just doesn't seem to be the way to go," Webber said.

"In the '70s, farmers were buying a lot of land, and bidding up the prices to get it. There was land inflation," Brownback said. "Many of those farmers borrowed a lot of money to buy that land."

Economists say farmers as a whole have one-third more debt — $210 billion — than they can adequately handle, Brownback said.

"A lot of farmers carried a lot of debt in the past," he said. "If he had a 30 percent debt-to-asset ratio, that was considered perfectly all right. In the '70s, that was good."

Since the '70s, land values have decreased by as much as 50 percent. For example, farmland that sold for $600 an acre might now sell for $300 an acre, he said.

"Now that the value of land has gone down so much, the same amount of debt in dollars might now represent a 60 percent debt-to-asset ratio, or even worse," Brownback said.

To make matters worse, many farmers are overextended at the same time. If many of them are trying to sell off property at the same time to reduce indebtedness, this means the farmers are bidding the price down on their own farm land, he said.

"Foreclosure is no guarantee the creditor has 'bid in' the market value of the land, rather than the amount owed, when beginning the foreclosure proceedings," said DeAnn Hupe, attorney for Farmers Assistance, Counselling and Training Service.

In other words, if the amount owed to creditors was $80,000 and the loan value of the property was $150,000, the person who looks ahead would 'bid in' $150,000 when setting up the foreclosure proceedings. If the court will agree to a value of $150,000, the entire debt would be cancelled when the property is sold and the $70,000 balance would likely cover the taxes on the income, Hupe said.

"Courts and attorneys are changing the method of figuring the foreclosures closer to market value, rather than selling at the amount owed, then following the farmer for the deficiency," she said. "In the old system, other property, such as the home, is 'at risk,' depending on factors."

Under Senate Bill 696, FmHA can set aside an amount of cash equal to one year's household expenses for food and fuel. This is called exempt property.

This sheltering is done before foreclosure because once taxes are levied on taxable income, the tax bill only can be removed from the books by paying the bill, she said.

Campus service helps farmers deal with problems

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

While the legal aspects of a farm financial crisis can be handled by lawyers and bureaucrats, individuals often are left on their own to deal with the ensuing emotional crisis.

But there is at least one organization on campus — Farmers Assistance, Counseling and Training Service — that helps individuals statewide with the emotional consequences of loss of the family farm, said Kim Williams, crisis counsellor for FACTS.

"We operate a 'hot line' to help farmers with their problems," Williams said. "We help them to prioritize their situation and sometimes just to get them through the day."

Typically, about 10 percent of the calls are for emotional assistance. The callers need to feel they are "in control," and much of their situation is out of their control, she said.

"Much of their problem centers around a feeling of guilt about failure," she said. "They are feeling a divorcing effect from the rest of the world, often because the farmer feels that this is not happening to anyone else, only himself."

Ag creditor may ask government for help

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Farm Credit System, the nation's largest farm lender, is likely to run out of money early next year and will have to come to Congress for a financial bailout, congressional investigators said Wednesday.

The General Accounting Office, in testimony released by Rep. Ed Jones, D-Tenn., estimated the system's losses this year will hit a record $2.9 billion, eclipsing losses in 1985 of $2.7 billion.

William J. Anderson, GAO assistant comptroller general, advised lawmakers to begin planning now for how the financial crisis will be handled.

"The uncertainty about federal involvement and the way it will work could create a crisis of confidence among the system's borrowers ... and among the system's investors," Anderson said in testimony prepared for a hearing on Thursday before Jones' Agriculture credit subcommittee.

"We cannot be certain about the precise time at which the system's surplus will be effectively exhausted," said Anderson, acknowledging that the system believes it will lose only $1.7 billion this year rather than the GAO's higher figure.

H. Brent Beesley, president of the Farm Credit Corporation of America, said his projections showed the surplus will not fall into the red until late in 1988.

A law passed last year revamped the system's regulatory framework and provided that if it exhausts all its resources, the government could provide direct infusions of money. Such a move would still require congressional approval, however.

Local farmers find grain elevators full

By JUDI WALTER
Collegian Reporter

With the grain elevators full of wheat, local farmers are wondering how they will store their fall crops of corn, milo and soybeans.

"It will be tight this year," said Bill Thornburrow, manager of Manhattan Milling Co.

"This year, the elevators are full before harvest with government wheat," he said. "It's the worst I've seen it in 26 years."

Some farmers are putting up storage facilities to protect the soon-to-be harvested corn. Most plan to store the grain in temporary buildings, while others will use sheds, Thornburrow said.

There can be problems with storing grain in the open and on the shed floor, including dealing with rodents and weather, he said. Children and farm animals also can be potential problems if they are allowed to climb on the grain.

The storage problem for farmers in the Frankfort area is with milo. Steve Shubkagel, manager of the Farmer's Union Elevator in Frankfort, said the elevator will store milo on the ground unless it is extremely wet. If the grain is too wet, the elevator will have to dry it, which slows the process.

Most of the corn in the Frankfort area will be put up as silage, providing enough room for storage of the small remainder of the crop, Shubkagel said.

High-moisture corn is considered to have at least 15.5 percent moisture content. Anything above 30 percent is termed "premature," said Clyde Wassom, professor of agronomy.

Wassom said there could be problems if grain is exposed to moisture during a long period of time. If the grain is not dried sufficently, the seed can suffer from mold, heat damage, deterioration of quality or develop a disease.

Thornburrow said he believes the corn harvest will not be at its peak until late October to mid-November.

Hayden defends stand on S. African sanctions

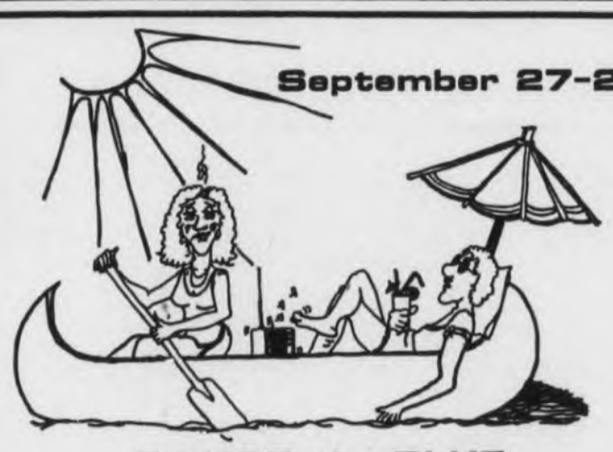
By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Republican governor nominee Mike Hayden, in a letter made public Wednesday, said he advocates withholding wheat sales to South Africa "only as a part of a national effort of full economic sanctions" against that nation.

He claimed in a letter to Howard Tice, executive secretary of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers, that his opposition to grain sales to South Africa "was taken totally out of context and has been misrepresented by my Democrat opponent and misunderstood by many Kansas farmers."

"I said that I am opposed to the sale of wheat to South Africa only as a part of a national effort of full economic sanctions to bring an end to racial persecution in that country, and if there is such a national effort, certainly Kansas farmers want to be part of it," Hayden wrote Tice.

However, in tape recordings of Hayden's statement opposing wheat sales to South Africa, made at Manhattan three weeks ago, he make no mention of "full economic sanctions." On the tapes, Hayden mentions only wheat sales and divestiture of investments in companies that do business in South Africa.



Kelley Hayden, his brother's campaign press secretary, admitted today that Mike Hayden's comments in response to questioning in Manhattan at a forum of agricultural reporters were not the same as his official position now.

"He realizes he didn't say total sanctions," Kelley Hayden said. "He meant to say that. Mike never meant to single out wheat as the only thing."

The wheat growers group had criticized Hayden's stand against wheat sales to South Africa.

A pickup truck passes the front of the Brookville Hotel prior to opening. By 6 p.m. every evening, the street will be crowded with the cars of visitors from across Kansas and surrounding states.

Hotel blends history, home cookin'

BROOKVILLE — Fifteen miles southwest of Salina, a century-old landmark's blend of history and world-renown food provide a strong lure for visitors.

The Brookville Hotel has been making mouths water with its famous cooking since 1870, when the railroad started spreading its tracks across the Kansas prairie.

"Brookville grew up with the railroad," said Mark Martin, fourth-generation owner and manager of the hotel.

The town was a divisional resupplying point for the Pacific Railroad during the cattle-driving days. Even Buffalo Bill considered the hotel his headquarters at one time, Martin said.

In the 1890s, the Pacific Railroad moved its divisional center from Brookville to Junction City, causing Brookville's population to dwindle, he said.

The hotel and restaurant didn't become nationally known until World War II. Soldiers from nearby Smoky Hill Air Base frequented the hotel, Martin said.

"The air base brought people from the four corners of the United States and they all ate with us," he said.

The hotel was registered in the Register of Historical Places with the Kansas State Historical Society on Jan. 7, 1972.

Martin attended Emporia State and moved to Salina when he took over the family business in 1974. His wife, Connie, works weekends at the hotel, and their 9-year-old daughter, Brandy, helps occasionally by seating customers and playing the piano in the lobby.

Martin said his work at the hotel gives him a lot of personal satisfaction.

"It's a fun business, it's a clean business and you get to meet the public," he said.

The food served at Brookville Hotel is nothing fancy, and the menu is standard fare — done right — that doesn't vary from day to day. But for those who have eaten there, the quality more than compensates for any lack of variety.

Fried chicken, lightly whipped potatoes with golden gravy, baking-powder biscuits and creamed corn comprise the menu.

"The recipes are very simple. We use common, everyday items," said Dorothy Hine, a hotel cook and resident of Brookville.

The chicken is fried in pure lard in a fryer that holds about 100 pieces. Those 100 pieces serve about 20 people, Martin said. For those customers who don't like chicken, the hotel will serve steak with advance notice.

Special kettles steam cook the cream-style corn and gravy. Martin called these "water-jacket" kettles that provide an all-around cooking surface.

Food preparation begins one hour before guests arrive.

"The products we use are very basic. We add color, history and personality, and hopefully people will enjoy it," Martin said.

A sign over the kitchen door reads, "Only good food and pleasant people pass through these doors." If the customers' reactions are any indication, the sign speaks the truth.

Although the hotel is mainly an evening dinner house, it does have a private club that serves drinks. Reservations are advisable, Martin said.

"We don't offer any entertainment," Martin said. "We let you bring that yourself."

Waitresses serve each meal family-style, starting with a relish plate, sweet-and-sour coleslaw and homemade cottage cheese. The main-course dishes are taken to the kitchen and refilled even before they are empty.

Martin said he employees 30 to 40 people who mostly commute to Brookville from surrounding areas.

"Most of our crew is fairly young, ranging in age from 16 to 62," he said.

Saturday night and all day Sunday are the busiest times. Sundays can be a 10-to 12-hour day, said Kesa Tague, a waitress at Brookville.

The busiest months are April through October, Martin said. During the winter months, the hotel is only open on weekends because people don't like to drive at night, he said.

"Family holidays are very good for us. On Mother's Day we usually serve around 900," Martin said.

The Brookville Hotel also provides catering services. Martin said they will reconstruct the hotel's whole meal, usually for groups of 30 to 40. Dining facilities are available for private parties and rehearsal dinners.

The hotel's guest book includes names from all around the world. About once a week, guests from overseas visit the hotel, Martin said.

Until 1972, guests could rent rooms at the hotel for $5, $6 and $7. Martin said he is thinking of offering rooms again through the hunting season this fall.

Evangelist promoting sectarianism, Bennett says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of Education William J. Bennett delivered a sharp rebuke Wednesday to television evangelist Pat Robertson for suggesting that Christian activists are more patriotic and family-loving than other people.

"This sort of invidious sectarianism must be renounced in the strongest terms," Bennett said in the prepared text of a speech he was delivering Wednesday night at the University of Missouri in Columbia.

An aide to the outspoken education secretary said it was just a coincidence that Bennett delivered the retort to Robertson on the same day that the Christian Broadcasting Network president was delivering a major speech on his presidential ambitions.

Robertson made the remarks that drew Bennett's fire at a news conference in Lasing, Mich., on July 30. Robertson said then that Christians getting active in politics felt "more strongly than others do" about "patriotism, love of God, love of country, support of traditional family."

Robertson added such beliefs were not "very radical. (It's) pretty much what Ronald Reagan believes in and has enunciated."

Bennett did not mention Robertson's name but attributed the sentiments to "a public figure."

Bennett said, "The vibrant families and warm patriotism of millions upon millions of non-Christian and non-religious Americans give it the lie. Its narrowness would have disappointed the Founders. And its intolerance clashes with the best traditions of our democracy."

Robertson was not immediately available for comment.

Bennett has drawn fire from some liberals for his close ties to the New Right and his efforts to promote federal aid for parochial and other private schools. He has appeared on Robertson's "700 Club" show.

• Bennett said Robertson "was on much firmer ground" last month when he told political reporters, "I don't think we should invest any candidate with the mantle of God."

"Religion should never be excluded from public debate. But ... it should never be used as a kind of divine trump card to foreclose further debate," said Bennett.

Bennett said politicians who send the message "'disagree with me and you're damned' ... insult the common sense and the tolerant spirit of the American people."

Bennett, who switched from the Democratic to the Republican Party just four months ago, reportedly was upset that Robertson's remarks in Lansing drew no public rebuke from other GOP leaders.

Bennett devoted most of his Paine Lecture at the University of Missouri to a spirited defense of the place of religion in American political life.

Religion helps develop character, he said, and church-going children are less likely to take drugs or become pregnant as teenagers.

Fun Fun For Fun For Fun For

Nominations open for Parents' Day

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

On Nov. 8, thousands of parents will walk along the campus paths, visit the housing facilities and spend time with their children.

And of these thousands, two will be named All-University Honorary Parents for Parents' Day '86.

Each year, Chimes Junior Honorary sponsors Parents' Day, a day K-State students are encouraged to invite their parents to the University and show them what K-State is all about.

"The purpose of this (award) is to recognize parents of K-State students who have contributed beyond the call of duty to the University and their community," said Mark Buyle, junior in marketing and president of Chimes.

Any University student may nominate his or her parents for the honor.

"This is a change from years past," Buyle said, "when only one set of parents was nominated by each living group."

Applications are available in the Union Activities Center on the third floor of the Union. Completed applications must be returned to the center by 5 p.m. on Oct. 3.

An essay based on the theme "From Roots to Wings" must be included with the application.

"In the essay, students are asked to reflect on what they have gained from past family experiences and from their relationship with their parents," Buyle said. "They are also asked to include their parents' involvement with K-State, their community and their encouragement for higher education."

Chimes will select one set of honorary parents on the basis of these essays.

All finalists will be given a certificate and their names will appear in the Parents' Day football program.

The All-University Honorary Parents will be special guests at a pre-game luncheon, sit with University President Jon Wefald and his wife during the football game, and be recognized at the halftime show with a plaque, Buyle said.

Several other activities have been scheduled for Parents' Day:

— Walking and video tours of campus will be given, beginning at 10 a.m. at the Union.

— Mini-classroom sessions will be conducted on the second floor of the Union from 10 to 10:45 a.m.

— A pre-game buffet in the Union Bluemont Room will be served from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.

— A Parents' Weekend Buffet will be served from 5:30 to 7 p.m. in the Union Ballroom.

— The movie "Murphy's Romance" will be shown at 7 and 9:30 p.m. in Union Forum Hall.

— A concert by the K-State Singers and Men's and Women's Glee Clubs will take place in McCain Auditorium at 8 p.m.

Chapter wins for third straight year

History society collects national honor

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's chapter of Phi Alpha Theta, the student history honorary society, has won a "best chapter of the year" award for the third consecutive year.

The chapter tied with the University of Kentucky and the University of California State-Fullerton in the category for universities with an enrollment of 18,000-plus students.

"This is the third time in three years that we've won an award," said Tom Kirker, president of Phi Alpha Theta and graduate in history. "In 1985, we won the award outright, and in 1984 we also tied."

In addition, the K-State chapter received a special commendation award in 1983, he said.

Phi Alpha Theta's purpose is to promote the study of history, Kirker said. Members believe society can learn from mistakes it has made in the past by looking at history. Other purposes of the organization are to stay up to date with the history professions, write articles on different history topics, attend conferences and to interact with the faculty.

Phi Alpha Theta also helps promote lectures of historical interest, such as the upcoming lectures by Karl F. Morrison, professor of history at the University of Kansas, and John Keegan, author of "The Face of Battle," Kirker said.

The honorary also has social activities, such as luncheons.

There are 40 active members, excluding faculty, in the K-State chapter. To be a member, a student must have completed at least 12 hours of history courses with a 3.5 grade point average. In addition, he or she must have an overall GPA of 3.2, Kirker said.

The chapter received $250 for winning the award. The money will be used to purchase history books for Farrell Library, he said.

Researchers developing carbonated milk drinks

By The Associated Press

ROSEMONT, Ill. — Researchers are working on a carbonated version of milk that won't leave a mustache on your upper lip or a film on your tongue, and just might help bail out strapped dairy farmers.

"It's a lot like club soda," Anthony Luksas, president of Dairy Research Inc., said Wednesday. "It's very refreshing. Normally, milk coats the mouth and people won't drink it to quench their thirst.

"But carbonated milk doesn't do that."

Luksas said researchers began toying with the idea about a year ago, after a brainstorming session at the suburban Chicago research facility operated by the United Dairy Industry Association trade group.

"We asked ourselves 'Why are we losing sales in whole milk?'" Luksas said. "We then asked, 'What are people drinking instead?' The answer was carbonated drinks.

"If we could just capture 2 or 3 percent of the carbonated beverage market, we could wipe out the dairy surplus we have each year," he said.

Carbonating milk is a relatively easy process, Luksas said. But he refused to describe it in detail because it has yet to be patented.

"Our product already has all the nutrition of skim milk," said Luksas.

Restructure approval may avoid utility rise

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Officials of the Sunflower Electric Cooperative of Hays told state utility regulators Wednesday they do not forsee need to increase rates if their latest plan for restructuring the utility's $652.9 million debt is approved.

In an informal meeting, cooperative officials briefed the Kansas Corporation Commission on the debt restructuring plan, which is expected to be submitted to the commission in the next 90 days for approval.

Steve Menaugh, spokesman for the commission, said the 1½ hour meeting included discussions of a threat by Garden City officials to end its contract with Sunflower.

"They told the commission that a pullout by Garden City would jeopardize the package," Menaugh said. "Garden City represents about 12 percent of Sunflower's power sales and they said it could jeopardize the debt restructuring plan."

The city is examining alternative sources of electricity and has authorized preparation of a notice to terminate the city's contract with Sunflower and Wheatland Electric Cooperative.

Sunflower sells electricity on a wholesale basis to eight member rural electric cooperatives, which serve about 44,000 customers.

Sunflower has been negotiating with its creditors for about a year on a plan to ease its financial problems, which stem from construction of a $446 million coal-fired electric power plant near Holcomb.

The utility defaulted on a federally guaranteed loan last year when it missed a September deadline for an $11 million interest payment. It has avoided filing for bankruptcy because the Rural Electrification Administration, its largest creditor and backer of the guaranteed loan, has given the utility more time to refinance its debt.

After the corporation commission rejected a restructuring plan which included a $5 million emergency rate increase, Sunflower went back and came up with a proposal under which the utility would be obligated for about 59 percent of its debt.

More than $100 million in debt will be written off after 32 years, if not repaid, under the plan approved by the U.S. Justice Department which was the last of 20 creditors to take action on it.

Sunflower will be obligated to service debt totaling $384 million. Of the remaining $268 million in debt, $163 million is projected to be repaid over the life of the cooperative's Holcomb power plant.

The corporation commission has final approval power over the debt restructuring plan and will take it under consideration once it is formally presented by Sunflower.

In March 1985, the commission granted Sunflower a $7.38 million rate increase — about 43 percent of the $17.2 million it was seeking — and said the co-op must come up with other ways to finance the power plant. It said the people of western Kansas could not handle utility rates any higher because they already pay among the highest rates in the nation.

Since then, Sunflower has negotiated, unsuccessfully, for the sale of power and of the plant itself.

The rate increase granted in March resulted in a 9.7 percent jump in Sunflower's wholesale rates, and was reflected by a 7.6 percent retail rate increase.

FAA investigates airspace controls

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Federal Aviation Administration disclosed Wednesday it is examining whether to redraw restricted airspace boundaries around 23 major airports, following the collision of a private plane and Mexican jetliner near Los Angeles.

FAA Administrator Donald Engen has directed a task force of senior FAA officials to examine all 23 so-called terminal control areas around the country to determine whether boundaries should be changed or other actions taken to make them safer.

The accident near Los Angeles, which killed at least 81 people Aug. 31, involved a small Piper aircraft, which had flown without authorization into a restricted terminal control area and collided with a Aeromexico DC-9 making a routine approach.

The terminal control area, or TCA, around the Los Angeles airport is especially complex because of nearby mountains and busy private air traffic from nearby general aviation airports.

FAA spokesman Stephen Hayes said the task force, headed by the agency's director of aviation safety, will make recommendations as to whether some of the TCA boundaries should be redrawn and possibly extended.

The task force, which is to make its report to Engen within 30 days, also is to look into how often unauthorized aircraft are penetrating a restricted zone and what is being done to reduce such incidents, Hayes said.

While the focus of the review will be on possible improvements in the TCAs, the task force also is to look into possible shortfalls in controller procedures or communications so that an intruding pilot can be pinpointed and directed out of a controlled airspace as quickly as possible, agency officials said.

The FAA has designated 23 airports where TCAs are established to reduce the possibility of commercial air traffic and other planes equipped with sophisticated equipment mixing with smaller and slower planes.

In all such controlled airspace, a pilot must obtain permission from air traffic controllers to enter and aircraft must be equipped with a transponder that allows the plane to clearly be shown on the controller's radar.

Nine of the 23 TCAs, including Los Angeles, also require that all aircraft have altitude-encoding transponders so that a controller knows the altitude of all planes in the controlled areas. The Piper aircraft involved in the Aug. 31 collision had no such transponder.

Bus service should stay, Docking says

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Democratic governor nominee Tom Docking Wednesday urged citizens in southeast Kansas to join forces in a effort to save bus service which is being threatened with elimination.

"My message as a candidate for governor has been and will continue to be that we must work together," Docking said after a five-city tour. "What happens in southeast Kansas affects the rest of the state. It hurts Wichita if people from Sedan, Coffeyville, Baxter Springs, Pittsburg and Fort Scott have no bus service to their city."

Those are the communities Docking went to Wednesday, listening to residents' concerns about the possible loss of bus service and outlining a three-point plan of action to counter the proposal of Trailways Lines Inc.

Meanwhile, Republican governor nominee Mike Hayden made public a letter he sent to Kansas Corporation Commission Chairman Michael Lennen, urging the commission to "seek whatever means are possible to maintain bus service in our communities."

Trailways has proposed elimination of all its routes in Kansas except one which serves Kansas City, Topeka and Wichita.

It would eliminate service to 56 Kansas communities, leaving 38 of them without any public transportation.

The KCC has ordered Trailways to show cause why it should be permitted to discontinue the routes.

In his three-step proposal, Docking urged the KCC "to gather more information on the cost of serving rural communities."

"Through reporting procedures, we will prove that the cost to our citizens, our communities and our state outweigh the corporate savings that would be derived from route cancellation," Docking said.

The lieutenant governor also said he will ask Trailways and other bus companies seeking to cut back their service in Kansas "to sit down with community representatives to develop and implement ideas for increasing bus usage, by both passengers and businesses."

His third proposal, Docking said, is to get residents and communities affected by the cutbacks to "suggest ideas that will save this bus service." He urged citizens to write Trailways with their ideas.

"We must consider scaled back routes around which senior citizens, organizations could plan for trips, and also the possibility that smaller, more efficient equipment could be assigned to these rural routes," Docking said.

Hayden said Kansas "cannot afford to sever this vital link joining our communities."

"The hometowns of thousands of Kansans would become completely isolated, and in many cases paralyzed, by the discontinuance of bus service," Hayden wrote the KCC chairman.

Kansas officials find 75 whooping cough cases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Department of Health and Environment said Wednesday it has confirmed 75 cases of whooping cough in Kansas, with another 44 suspected cases of the respiratory ailment known formally as pertussin.

The death of an 8-month-old baby in Topeka is being attributed indirectly to whooping cough, a department spokesman said.

Nearly 100 of the cases — 69 confirmed and 28 suspected — are in Shawnee County, which includes Topeka.

Bob Moody, information officer for KDHE, said the other confirmed cases include two in Nemaha County and one each in Pottawatomie, Jackson, Brown and Leavenworth Counties.

The other suspected cases include seven in Leavenworth County, four in McPherson County, two in Saline County and one each in Atchison, Bourbon and Osage counties.

"It's not an epidemic, but it is an outbreak," Moody said of health officials' classification of the spread of whooping cough.

Asked if it was waning or still spreading, Moody replied, "It's hard to tell because of the reporting lag. It's difficult to tell until you know the date of onset, when the victims started showing symptoms."

The first symptoms are a runny nose and minor cough. Within a week the cough becomes more severe and may last one to two months. Pertussin can lead to complications such as pneumonia and encephalitis.

The Topeka-Shawnee County Health Department reported the baby's death to the state agency Tuesday. Moody said the baby had not been diagnosed as having whooping cough until tests performed during an autopsy revealed the child had pertussin.

Larry Noble, professor of physical education, dance and leisure studies, invented the "sweet spot" baseball bat, a bat that allows a more powerful hit by moving the weight inside the hollow bat. Noble is selling the exclusive rights for the new bat to Louisville Slugger.

Fresh bat design: How 'sweet' it is

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

The "sweet spot" on baseball bats looks sweeter than ever to Larry Noble.

Louisville Slugger is buying exclusive rights to Noble's innovative bat design which features a new location of a bat's "sweet spot."

Representatives from Hillerich & Bradsby of Louisville, Ky., are slated to meet with Noble, professor of physical education, dance and leisure studies, this week to possibly sign a contract which would grant the company rights to test the new bat.

"They are signing a contract with us to check this out. That impresses me," Noble said. "They want a clause in there to check it out, so they're not just jumping in. They want a period of time to do field tests."

Noble discovered a way to move the "sweet spot," or center of percussion, in hollow-walled aluminum softball bats by placing a solid, firmly adhered weight inside the bat.

No previous design has been able to control its location, although various bats have used different formulas for weight distribution.

"It's an advantage for the power hitter because if it's on the end of the bat, the effective hitting area is enlarged," Noble said. "The end of the bat is moving faster than any other area of the bat so the ball will go farther. The sweet spot is the spot that allows the impact impulse to be put back into the ball."

And if the sweet spot is located near the batter's hands, it gives him greater control over where the ball will go when it is hit, Noble said.

The development is important for softball players because it can increase the effective length of a bat without increasing the bat's actual measurement, Noble said. The effective length is the distance from the center of percussion to the hands.

"The power hitter wants to increase the effective length but the rules in softball say that the bat can only be 34 inches long," he said. "So how do we get greater effective length? Put the sweet spot out there near the end."

Noble got the idea for the new bat design in 1981, then began data collection on the project three years ago. Working with former K-State physics professor John Eck, he finished research in 1984.

Eck and Noble applied theoretical rigid body mechanics and physical pendulum principles to baseball bats. They considered the bat as a physical pendulum because it rotates around an axis during impact.

However, the theory that the bat is a rigid body was a problem to test because it vibrates upon striking the ball, Noble said.

The experimental bats were tested on the playing field.

"What is routinely done is to put it (the new bat) in the hands of hitters who don't know which bat is which. It's interesting," Noble said.

'It's an advantage for the power hitter because if it's on the end of the bat, the effective hitting area is enlarged.'
—Larry Noble

Noble has been working with the KSU Research Foundation to obtain a patent. Although the patent hasn't been officially approved by the U.S. Patent Office, Noble said he is optimistic that it will be accepted soon.

If the patent is granted, Noble will receive a percentage of the gross royalties from sales while the KSU Research Foundation will absorb the remainder. The research foundation takes the risk of legal fees in getting the patent processed, which can cost up to $20,000.

Professors who work with the foundation usually receive 10 percent to 20 percent of the royalties, Noble said.

Noble approached two bat companies with his idea. Hillerich & Bradsby indicated an interest in producing the bat.

"If things work out, they're likely to have the bats in the hands of test hitters before this fall season is over," Noble said.

Nation faces harsh reality of drugs, intercollegiate athletics

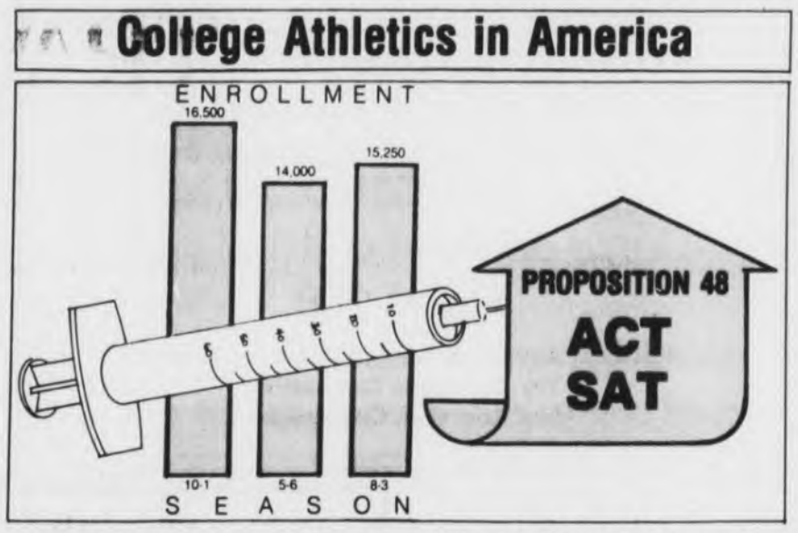
By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the fourth in a five-part series titled "College Athletics in America.

The entire nation was awakened with a pair of cold slaps across the face this past summer. The drug-related deaths of nationally known athletes Len Bias and Don Rogers forced the nation to face the drug crisis from which it had been hiding for years.

"It was a slap in the face," University President Jon Wefald said. "Here we have two athletes in the prime of their lives, and in absolute physical condition. And with an overdose of cocaine, they literally committed suicide."

"Most people knew there was a problem (before the deaths)," said K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis. "Boy, I tell you, it's critical now. It brought another black eye to college athletics."



With all the woes of college athletics, the abuse of illegal drugs such as cocaine by student-athletes might be the most critical. K-State presently checks all of its athletes for the presence of drugs with urine tests.

If the athlete tests positive, a number of steps are taken to counsel the athlete. The last of these steps is to tell the athlete's coach of the problem and have the coach take disciplinary action against the athlete, if necessary.

"(Drugs are) here; they're everywhere," Travis said. "The percentage, though, is very small. Less than 1 percent (of K-State's athletes) test positive."

Under Travis' new "Total Person" program, Wildcat athletes attend sessions each semester aimed at educating them on the effects drugs can have upon both their lives and athletic performances.

"This situation can be handled better with education (than drug testing)," Travis said.

Wefald actively supports Travis' emphasis on drug education. K-State's "Total Person" program and its approach to drugs is one of the most progressive programs in intercollegiate athletics.

"We can't do too much to convince our athletes that this is a deadly game," Wefald said.

Veryl Switzer, director of minority affairs, was a Wildcat running back from 1951-53. Switzer knows drug abuse has been a problem for years, but he thinks too often society tries to put all of the blame on athletes.

"Drugs is not a new phenomena. It's been here for years," Switzer said. "This just isn't athletics, though. There are similar problems in society at large. We don't read about the non-student athlete who dies from a drug overdose.

"The pressure on college athletes are incredible. Society has not assumed its responsiblity. This is a national crisis. Athletes are human beings just like everyone else."

Former K-State basketball star Rolando Blackman now plays in the National Basketball Assocation with the Dallas Mavericks. He has seen drug abuse in his profession, but he thinks the problems professional athletes have are often blown out of proportion by press exposure.

"It (drug use) plays a part in professional sports, but not as big as it's publicized to be," Blackman said. "Drug abuse occurs in all of our society. Doctors, engineers and even people in Congress (are involved with drugs)."

Wefald said he might support drug testing and drug education, but he realizes the problem of drug abuse in the United States must eventually be handled on a national level, starting at the nation's borders.

"Someone is going to have to say, 'Enough is enough. We can not permit these drugs to come into (the United States),'" Wefald said. "It's having a negative effect on an entire generation. There is a national epidemic going on."

Travis said Bias and Rogers' deaths quickly makes people realize the delicate line between being in the prime of one's life and the end of existence.

"It's scary...you are never going to stop the people who are really hooked (from abusing drugs)," Travis said. "But if those deaths discourage the one- or two-time users, then it has accomplished something."

Kosar charges into encounter with Bengals

By The Associated Press

CLEVELAND — The development of Bernie Kosar from a promising quarterback into a productive player has made the Cleveland Browns' offense much more complicated, Cincinnati Bengals' Coach Sam Wyche says.

"The fact that they are able to produce in the air as well as on the ground is a problem," said Wyche, whose Bengals face the Browns Thursday night in a nationally televised NFL game.

"Last year, if you stopped the run, you probably stopped their offense," Wyche said. "But if you've got the threat of the pass that's equal with the threat of the run, you double your options."

As an NFL rookie last year, Kosar displayed a strong arm but a frequent inability to maneuver long enough to find open receivers.

Kosar's statistics through the Browns' first two games this season are not as impressive as his performances would have suggested. He has completed 34 of 66 passes for 469 yards and two touchdowns, with one interception.

Faunce helps K-State's punting stay consistent

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Throughout the disappointments of the early part of K-State's football season, one pillar of consistency has stood its ground — the punting of senior Troy Faunce.

"Troy has done an outstanding job for us," Coach Stan Parrish said. "I think he's an excellent punter."

Faunce has displayed his talents more often than Parrish would like, however, due to the ineffectiveness of the K-State offense.

Against Northern Iowa, Faunce punted 10 times for an average of 38.2 yards — roughly his season mark. But Faunce doesn't consider statistics the measure of his success.

"Different situations dictate if you've got to try to get the other team deep in their territory, and where the ball is actually at makes a difference," he said. "I feel like my job is to do the best I can to put the other team in a hole."

"He is a team guy," Parrish said. "He'll kick it down there and try to kick it out of bounds rather than worry about his average."

Faunce said he is solely responsible for his performance.

"If I don't have a satisfactory performance, then I've got to correct those mistakes myself," he said. "Nobody can do that for me."

Most of Faunce's skills, he said, are self-taught, and his success can be attributed to practice and dedication.

"I've kicked as long as I can remember," Faunce said. "I started playing football in the first grade. We played flag football in the first grade, and I started kicking then."

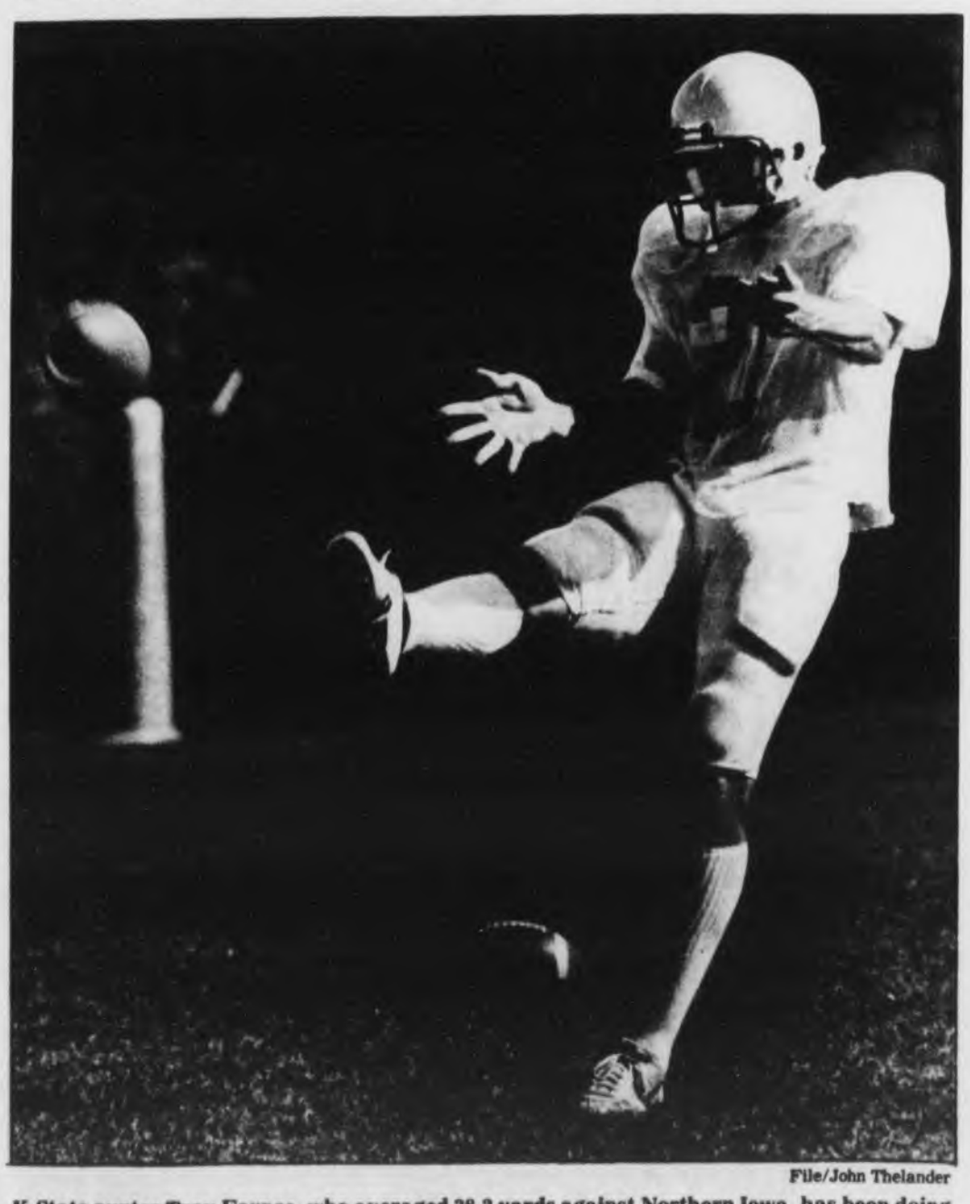
"Punters have to work alone a lot of the time," he said. "They're not under constant supervision. They have to have the discipline to do their daily drills and improve each and every day...Kickers are a lot like baseball players — they go into slumps and they have hot streaks."

Faunce, from Holt, Mo., was second in the Big Eight and 23rd in the nation last season with an average of 42.3 yards a kick. He was also a first-team selection to an academic All-American squad.

Faunce transferred to K-State in 1985 from Graceland College in Lamoni, Iowa, where he was an all-conference and all-district punter. He joined the 'Cats as a walk-on and earned a starting position last year.

"I like the thrill of playing in a big-time atmosphere," Faunce said. "That was one of the reasons I transferred to a major school."



Even though Faunce may only be called on a few times each game, he said he must keep himself involved in the game's progress in order to be effective.

"My preparation for the game really isn't much different than anybody else's," Faunce said. "If I don't stay in the ball game and feel like I'm ready to play, then I'm not really geared in, and I'm not loosened up to do my job.

"As far as when the defense is out there, I'm usually walking up and down (the sideline) to keep my legs loose and cheer the defense on. Then when the offense is on, I'm usually stretching or hitting a couple of kicks into the net."

Faunce, however, said he must avoid concentrating too much on the next kick.

"If you think about it too much," he said, "you can make mistakes."

File/John Thelander

K-State punter Troy Faunce, who averaged 38.2 yards against Northern Iowa, has been doing an outstanding job, according to Coach Stan Parrish. Faunce was second in the Big Eight and 23rd in the nation last season, averaging 42.3 yards a kick.

Reagan wants 25 Soviets out of U.N.

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration on Wednesday ordered the expulsion of 25 U.N.-based Soviet diplomats, but said the action was unrelated to the spy charges Moscow has filed against American journalist Nicholas Daniloff.

State Department spokesman Bernard Kalb said the expulsion was a follow-up to a U.S. decision announced six months ago, to force cutbacks in the Soviets' U.N. presence. The administration has maintained that the Soviet staff at the U.N. is disproportionately large and engages in spy activities.

For its part, the Soviets have insisted that the required reductions violate the obligations the United States has undertaken as host country for the U.N.

The names of the personnel affected by the order were turned over to Soviet officials by the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., Vernon Walters. The 25 were given until Oct. 1 to leave the country.

The Soviet U.N. Mission immediately signaled that it will resist the the order.

"I think there will be a protest, Valentin G. Karymov, a senior counselor at the Soviet mission, told a reporter by telephone. The diplomat, however, said the U.S. note would first be studied by Moscow before a formal response is made.

While the administration has promised retaliation in the Daniloff case, Kalb was categorical in stating that the expulsion order "is not related to that issue.

Secretary of State George Shultz had said Tuesday night that the United States has a "plan of action for dealing with the Daniloff case but declined to give details. He said the issue has "put a cloud over Soviet-American relations.

Last March, the Reagan administration announced that the Soviets would be required to reduce their U.N. staff by from 275 to 170 over a two-year period in increments of roughly 25 every six months.

Of the 105 to be sent home, a small number would be attached to the staffs of two Soviet republics, Ukrainia and Byelorussia, both of which have U.N. seats. All 25 affected by Wednesday's announcement, however, represent Moscow's delegation.

But Kalb refused to say whether any had engaged in spying.

The Soviets have 243 diplomats attached to the U.N. while the two Soviet republics have a combined total of 32.

A U.S. official who asked not to be identified said the Soviet total has dropped below 243, but added that the Soviets have never indicated that any of those who departed did so as a result of the expulsion order of last March.

In any case, he said, the Soviets will be operating under a ceiling of 218 until the United States orders the withdrawal of an additional group of diplomats, presumably next March.

Ex-smokers less likely to have strokes

Study shows risk significantly reduced

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Cigarette smokers are far more likely than non-smokers to suffer strokes, one of the nation's leading causes of death, but they can reduce their risk significantly by giving up the habit, a new study concludes.

Cigarettes have already been linked with heart attacks, emphysema and cancers of the lungs, mouth, throat, bladder and pancreas. The latest research demonstrates one more way that smoking can kill.

Strokes are the nation's third leading cause of death after heart attacks and cancer. An estimated 500,000 people have strokes each year, and 156,000 die. Because of damage to the brain, however, about 40 percent of survivors require special services, such as physical therapy or speech therapy.

Earlier studies also found that smokers have an increased risk of strokes, but the new research goes a step farther to see what happens when they quit cigarettes.

"We have evidence that people who stop smoking can reduce their incidence of stroke," said Dr. Robert D. Abbott, a biostatistician at the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute in Bethesda, Md.

His research, based on figures gathered by the Honolulu Heart Program, was published in Thursday's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

Over the past two decades, the death rate from strokes has fallen by about 30 percent. Experts have attributed this to better control of high blood pressure, which can trigger strokes. But Abbott says Americans' success in giving up cigarettes has also probably played a part in this reduction.

The study enrolled 3,435 cigarette smokers and 4,437 non-smokers, all men of Japanese ancestry who lived on the island of Oahu. During 12 years of followup, 171 smokers and 117 non-smokers had strokes.

When the researchers took into account differences in the men's age, blood pressure and other characteristics, they calculated that smokers had two to three times higher risk of stroke than did non-smokers.

A stroke is an interruption in the flow of blood to the brain. There are two basic kinds. A hemorrhagic stroke occurs when a blood vessel bursts. A thromboembolic stroke results from a blood clot that shuts off the flow blood.

The researchers found that both types were more frequent among smokers. However, hemorrhagic strokes, the more lethal of the two, were increased more.

During the 12 years of followup, there were 11 strokes for every 1,000 people among the non-smokers. For those who continued to smoke throughout the period, there were three times that many, or 33 strokes for every 1,000 people. However, for people who quit smoking by the sixth year of followup, there were 23 strokes.

Abbott said he believes the stroke risk among the reformed smokers will continue to drop.

Bomb

The attack was the bloodiest since the recent wave of bombings began Sept. 8. Earlier explosions hit a city hall post office, a cafeteria in suburban La Defense, the Pub Renault on the Champs-Elysees Avenue and police headquarters in central Paris.

Groups calling themselves the Committee for Solidarity with Arab and Middle East Political Prisoners and the Partisans of Rights and Freedom have issued conflicting claims of responsibility for the earlier bombings and threatened new attacks unless Georges Ibrahim Abdallah and two other jailed Middle Easterners are freed.

In Beirut, an Arabic statement signed by the Committee for Soldiarity threatened to launch attacks in the United States.

The two-page statement, delivered Wednesday to the independent newspaper An-Nahar, said, "We shall meet soon in your great states. We shall get acquainted with great states, your cities, your skyscrapers, your Statue of Liberty."

French police said Wednesday that Abdallah's brother, Robert, was a prime suspect in the cafeteria bombing, and 200,000 posters were being distributed with his picture and that of another brother, Maurice.

committee wants additional time because they believe more of the original prospects will be available when football season is completed.

The Jacksonville newspaper also reported Wednesday that two search committee members said two finalists were "unacceptable." The committee members did not name the finalists they were talking about.

Travis was one of seven finalists selected from 59 applicants and nominees. K-State's AD is the fourth finalist to withdraw his name from consideration.

Other finalists — North Carolina AD John Swafford, Arizona AD Cedric Dempsey and Lousiana State football coach Bill Arnsbarger — withdrew their names because of bad timing, according to Alsobrook. Ten others withdrew their names before interviews started for the same reason.

Remaining finalists include ADs David Wagner of Georgia Southern, Fred Grunninger of Rutgers and Richard Young of Washington State.

The search committee did not specify when they would make a recommendation to Marshall Criser, University of Florida president. Criser has not received the recommendation because he is out of town.

A press release from the president's office is expected sometime next week, Alsobrook said.

Jews.

Rehnquist said he had been told about the legally unenforceable restriction by his Vermont lawyer when he bought the home in 1974, but had forgotten about it. He is taking legal action to have the restriction deleted.

Also disclosed at the hearings was the fact that as a lawyer in Phoenix, Ariz., two decades ago, Rehnquist owned a home with a deed bearing a similar clause barring its sale to nonwhites. He said he had not known about it.

Rehnquist's brother-in-law, Harold D. Cornell of San Diego, says Rehnquist, unethically, failed to tell him about the terms of a $25,000 family trust. Rehnquist has refused to comment on the allegations.

Five people swore under oath that Rehnquist played an active role in harassing and intimidating black and Hispanic voters as a Republican Party official in Phoenix in the early 1960s. As he had during his 1971 confirmation hearings, Rehnquist swore under oath he could remember no such incidents.

As they had in 1971, Rehnquist's opponents said a 1952 memorandum he wrote as a Supreme Court law clerk supporting racial segregation reflected his own view.

the oilmen, will suffer, Barancik said. This is because Kansas will no longer e receiving tax revenue from Kansas oil.

Barancik said Mobil has been affected positively and adversely by the changing prices. It has benefited because it is able to sell more gasoline at the pumps.

However, it has suffered because it invested in crude oil at a high price and when the price dropped, the value of the stock decreased.

Barancik predicted gas prices would remain low because OPEC has shown no indication they will arrive at a consistent price for crude.

Athletics aids image, V.P. says

By The Collegian Staff

Athletics are an "important ingredient" in efforts to improve the University's image, said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, in an address to Student Senate Thursday.

"I think when you get to the level of a Big Eight institution, the academic quality is assumed," Krause said. Often it's athletics that make the difference in recruitment, he said.

K-State has a strong sense of pride and competition that is "personified in a highly visible athletic program," he said.

In his second week on the job, Krause named improving the University's image as one of three steps in attaining "institutional self-renewal."

The University must also work to increase its accessibility to all residents of the state and set a strategy for fund-raising, Krause said.

Because a large part of higher education is funded by Kansas tax dollars, the University has a "moral obligation" to make clear to state residents what it offers for them, he said.

"It's coming in loud and clear that we're not known for academic programs beyond agriculture and engineering," he said. "The challenge is to get the public to understand the broad array available."

The University can't "duck the decisions" by taking the attitude of a victim of declining enrollment, Krause said.

"No decision is still a decision," and choices must be made in reassessing the strengths and weaknesses of present University programs to find a direction for the future, he said.

"I would rather have problems and ideas surface right away," Krause said. As a way to increase interaction with students, Krause and Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, plan to randomly select 10 students each month for a luncheon discussion of the University.

"We're saying, 'We'll buy you lunch, and let's talk about business at K-State,'" Krause said. The first luncheon is scheduled for Sept. 30, he said. If the meals become an effective method of drawing student feedback, Krause said he would like to increase the frequency to twice a month.

In other business, Student Senate approved guidelines for spending the Officials seek coliseum OK from Regents

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

The University will ask the Kansas Board of Regents to approve plans for the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum today in Hays, said Charles Hein, acting director of the coliseum.

Hein said University President Jon Wefald and Vice President for Administration and Finance George Miller will also ask the Regents for authorization to issue a $2 million bond for the coliseum.

Hein said the issuing of the $2 million bond is standard procedure for a project as large as the coliseum.

"We've collected fees and gifts to help finance the coliseum," Hein said. "We need to issue a bond which will be retired (paid) from the revenues generated from gifts and fees."

Hein said the total budget for the coliseum is $17,520,500. Funding sources include $7 million from student fees, $2 million loaned to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics from the KSU Foundation and $8,520,500 from contributions raised through the Foundation.

Plans for the coliseum include 13,000 permanent seats, 500 portable seats, and offices for coliseum management, ticket manager and ticket sales. Multipurpose features include rigging points for a stage backdrop, theatrical lighting, follow spotlights, sound system, air conditioning, press hospitality room/performers' greenroom and an enclosed subconcourse area.

Plans also include four handicapped seating areas at the top of the arena, containing a total of 24 spaces.

Hein said if bids for the coliseum come in under the $17,520,500 budget, alternative features could be added to the coliseum.

These alternates, in priority order and cost, include: a south annex, including offices for intercollegiate athletics, coliseum staff, sports information, television studio and con-

Shultz to demand Daniloff's freedom

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George P. Shultz will confront Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze head-on Friday with a demand to free American reporter Nicholas Daniloff, and is ready to cut short their summit planning session unless he gets a satisfactory reply, U.S. officials said.

In Moscow, however, Soviet leader Mikail S. Gorbachev on Thursday denounced the correspondent for U.S. News & World Report as a spy and suggested the United States had exploited the case to try to spoil superpower relations.

As tensions rose, the Soviets exchanged barbs with the Reagan administration Thursday over a U.S. order that 25 Soviet diplomats assigned to the United Nations leave the country by Oct. 1.

Shevardnadze, arriving at Andrews Air Force Base on the eve of the two-day meeting with Shultz, called the expulsion illegal and also "a bad decision."

In New York, the chief Soviet U.N. delegate, Alexander Belonogov, said the Soviets already had cut their mission to 208, which is 10 below the demanded level.

But Bernard Kalb, the State Department spokesman, said Soviets holding visas were "well over the level of 218." He declined to give a precise count, and he accused the Soviets of disobeying the order, issued initially last March, by not providing the names of any departing diplomats.

The U.S. spokesman, responding to Gorbachev's statement on Daniloff, said the reporter was the victim of "contrived charges, a frameup, and there is no retreat from that."

Kalb said the Daniloff case was Shultz' "priority" in the impending session with Shevardnadze.

Another U.S. official, who demanded anonymity, said Shultz was prepared to end the discussion "after five minutes" if Shevardnadze did not provide an acceptable reply.

Killing of French embassy attache latest example of Beruit terrorism

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A lone assassin using a silencer-equipped pistol killed the French military attache outside the French Embassy Thursday. It was the latest of a series of terrorist attacks on French targets here and in Paris.

Anonymous telephone callers in Lebanon and France claimed responsibility for the assassination in the name of two obscure groups and threatened further blows. One demanded release of an alleged terrorist jailed in France.

Police said Col. Christian Goutierre, 60, had parked his car near the French Embassy in Christian east Beirut at 8:30 a.m. and was about to get out when the gunman approached him.

They said the attacker shot Goutierre three times in the head with a silencer-equipped pistol and escaped in a waiting green BMW. Police described the gunman as a tall, dark-complexioned man wearing a white shirt and beige trousers and believed to be in his late 20s.

Goutierre had parked his car outside the embassy's security zone, which extends 100 yards around the four-story building and is patrolled by embassy guards and Lebanese police. There was no immediate explanation why he did not park in the security zone.

Goutierre had been stationed in Beirut since October 1984.

France, like most Western countries, moved its embassy to Christian east Beirut from the Moslem western sector two years ago because of frequent kidnappings and bombings. Switzerland and Greece are the only Western countries that still have embassies in west Beirut.

The first claim of responsibility came from an anonymous telephone caller to a Western news agency in Beirut. He said the assassination was carried out on behalf of the Revenge and Justice Front, previously unknown.

"Let (French Prime Minister Jacques) Chirac know our next blow will be more crippling," said the caller, who did not say what the group wanted.

Later, a caller to a Western news agency office in Paris claimed the attache had been killed by Anti-Imperialist International Brigades "revolutionaries."

That group name was used previously in rocket and bombing attacks last May on the U.S., Japanese and Canadian embassies in Indonesia.

The second caller threatened all French diplomats, French President Francois Mitterrand and Chirac, and demanded release of three comrades jailed in France, including George Ibrahim Abdallah, reputed leader of the Lebanese Armed Revolutionary Factions. Abdallah, a Christian from northern Lebanon, is serving a four-year sentence for possessing illegal weapons and false documents.

Abdallah's release has also been demanded by those who claimed responsibility for a recent series of bombings in Paris.

In addition, French peacekeeping soldiers in the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) have come under repeated attack in recent weeks, and seven Frenchmen still are missing after being abducted by gunmen in Beirut in the past two years.

Aquino thanks U.S. for support, vows to fight communist rebels

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Philippine President Corazon Aquino, in a speech that brought a shower of affection from a joint session of Congress, pledged Thursday to take up "the sword of war" if peacemaking with communist rebels fails.

Aquino, in the seventh month of her leadership of a major U.S. ally which was led for more than 20 years by Ferdinand Marcos, offered thanks for the role Congress played in changing U.S. policy toward her country.

At the same time, Aquino, widow of the assassinated Benigno Aquino, an opposition leader in the last years of Marcos, appealed for help to build "a new home for democracy, another haven for the oppressed."

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., said afterward, "That's the finest speech I've heard in my 34 years in Congress."

Within hours of her speech, the House passed 203-197 a bill giving the Philippines a $200 million cash infusion to help deal with economic distress. The measure was sent to the Senate, where prospects for approval were uncertain.

Aquino underscored her policy of negotiating with the Communist New People's Army guerrilla movement but said, "I will not stand by and allow an insurgent leadership to spurn our offer of peace and kill our young soldiers and threaten our new freedom."

"We face a communist insurgency that feeds on economic deterioration, even as we carry a great share of the free world defenses in the Pacific," she said in her only reference to U.S. military bases in the Philippines.

Invoking the name of President Abraham Lincoln, Aquino said, "I understand that force may be necessary before mercy. Like Lincoln, I don't relish it, yet I will do whatever it takes to defend the integrity and freedom my country.

"I must explore the path of peace to the utmost, for at its end, whatever disappointment I meet there, is the moral basis for laying down the olive branch of peace and taking up the sword of war," she said.

Aquino is on a nine-day official visit to the country where she lived for 10 years, first as a student and later in exile until her husband was assassinated on his return to Manila. She is to address the United Nations in New York on Monday.

S. African union vows mine safety

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — The country's largest black miners union vowed Thursday to make safety an issue in contract talks after the worst gold mine disaster in the nation's history claimed at least 177 lives.

"We believe this accident could have been avoided," Cyril Ramaphosa, general secretary of the 250,000-member National Union of Mineworkers, said in a radio interview.

"Safety conditions for too long have been regarded as the prerogative of mine management. We want to make safety a negotiable issue," Ramaphosa said.

It was unclear whether the miners' union would go ahead with contract talks with the mine industry association scheduled for Friday. The talks have been conducted intermittently for four months but have focused so far on wages.

Japan imposes apartheid sanctions

TOKYO — Japan announced new anti-apartheid sanctions against South Africa today, banning imports of iron and steel, curtailing visas to its citizens and limiting travel between the two countries.

"The situation is South Africa, which shows no sign of improvement, has led to such a serious stage that some steps must be taken," Chief Cabinet Secretary Masaharu Gotoda said after the Cabinet approved the package.

Gotoda said Japan will bar imports of iron and steel products from South Africa, but not iron ore or coal. The ban will not apply to current contracts.

Japan also will stop issuing visas to South African tourists, ban commercial flights between the two countries, prohibit Japanese officials from flying on South African airliners abroad and ask Japanese citizens not to visit that nation.

NRC defends Tennessee decision

WASHINGTON — The Nuclear Regulatory Commission on Thursday defended its efforts to tighten regulatory screws on a contaminated nuclear fuel production plant that has been the sole source of fuel for Navy nuclear submarines.

But one of the NRC's members said the commission's staff could have been more aggressive.

It is "entirely incorrect" to say the NRC is not being aggressive in regulating the Nuclear Fuel Services plant in Erwin, Tenn., commission chairman Lando Zech told a House subcommittee.

"The NRC record of monitoring and oversight would indicate...concern over a number of years at that facility," Zech said, responding to criticism from Rep. Edward Markey, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on energy conservation and power.

Based on complaints last December from the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Union, Markey's subcommittee studied NRC documents on plant conditions and concluded that the facility is "the most dangerous uranium fuel production plant that the NRC licenses."

Ninja-dressed man robs gas station

RAYTOWN, Mo. — A robber dressed in a black Ninja warrior outfit and wielding a 2½-foot sword took about $230 from a Raytown gas station early Thursday, authorities said.

The robber who wore a black hood and a mask over the bottom of his face confronted the cashier at about 2:30 a.m., Raytown Police Chief Kris Turnbow said.

The cashier told police that the man spoke softly with what he thought was a fake Oriental accent. The man pointed his sword toward a door near the cash register. The cashier said he could not understand whether the robber was saying "open door" or "open drawer" so he opened both the cash register and a door behind the counter.

Turnbow said that after he got the money, the robber forced the cashier into a restroom. When the cashier heard a truck pull up to the station, he left the restroom. The truck driver said he saw a man in a Ninja outfit running from the area.

Ninja are ancient Japanese warriors known as "silent assassins," according to area martial arts experts.

Kansas residents seek arms summit

WASHINGTON — In a gesture of grassroots diplomacy, a group of Kansas residents and university students extended invitations Thursday to Soviet and U.S. officials for a nuclear arms summit in Lawrence.

The 11-member delegation from the community in northeast Kansas delivered 12,200 signed postcards to Soviet Embassy and White House officials inviting President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev to a meeting "to achieve arms control and better relations."

Soviet Minister-Counselor Oleg Sokolv told the group during a 20-minute meeting that the invitation would be considered and described it as an "expression of good will and good feelings."

Two counties to gain disaster aid

WASHINGTON — Residents of two eastern Kansas counties will be eligible for federal disaster aid under an order approved Thursday by the Small Business Administration.

The disaster declaration by the SBA will make low-interest loans available to businessmen, homeowners and renters in Coffey and Allen counties, according to Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan.

The aid is to help cover losses from storms with high winds and hail that struck the area in early August, causing about $20 million in damages.

Homeowners will be eligible for loans up to $120,000 to cover structural damages and personal property losses. Renters can obtain loans up to $20,000 for personal property losses and businesses can receive up to $500,000 loans.

In all cases, the loans will carry a 4 percent interest rate for people unable to obtain credit from other sources. Those that can find credit elsewhere are eligible for 8 percent interest financing.

Teacher salaries must rise to ensure quality, Docking says

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

Democratic gubernatorial nominee Lt. Gov. Tom Docking said Thursday that he advocates the "FUTURE Program" to guarantee parents the ability to provide their children with a college education.

Docking focused on educational issues when he spoke to the American Association of University Professors at the Union.

"The FUTURE Program, Full Tuition Undergraduate Reward for Excellence, would allow, for the first time in our state's history, guarantee to the parents of pre-college age children, that they can set aside funds now or set aside over a period of time (for their chidren's education)," Docking said.

"The state would in turn give them a current guarantee that regardless of what the cost of college tuition at the time their child reaches college age, they would have a guarantee of full tuition for that child at any Regent's institution, private college or community college located within the state of Kansas," he said.

Docking said he is interested in maintaining the commitment quality public education and higher education by providing more opportunities through efforts such as the FUTURE Program.

"We are at risk in losing some of our most highly qualified teachers in K-12," Docking said. "We are facing an impending teacher shortage, and we are consistently paying teachers less than the national average.

"If we continue to do so, all of our work on the Kansas plan to ensure the quality of that teaching staff will have been wasted."

He said it is necessary to use new ideas to encourage young people to remain in Kansas.

"There is a great deal of talk about the 'brain drain.' I am one of those who believes it is a fact that we are losing many of the fine young minds we have in this state," Docking said.

Universities should work to draw the business community and private sectors closer, Docking said.

"I believe that in terms of program development and placement that on the jobs front and on the education front we're going to be better off in the long run if we can bring those two closer together and that the public sector can serve as one of the vehicles to make that happen."

Embargoes hurt agriculture, gubernatorial candidate says

By RENEE BEAUDOIN
Government Editor

Enacting another grain embargo would send a very negative message to any purchaser of U.S. agricultural products and only serve to hurt the American farmer, Lt. Gov. Tom Docking, Democratic gubernatorial candidate, said in an interview Thursday.

"Food should never be used as a weapon of foreign policy because it's been demonstrated completely ineffective in doing anything but harming the farmers," Docking said.

"I strongly oppose any other type of grain embargo to any of our potential purchasers," he said. "More important than who that individual purchaser is, is the very negative message that we send to other purchasers — that we are not a reliable supplier. That hurts us in the long run more than anything else."

Docking said he advocates sanctions, other than a grain embargo, to try to help stop apartheid in South Africa.

"I believe we ought to take steps that are effective in forcing change on the system of apartheid in South Africa. Economic sanctions will have an effect," Docking said.

"A grain embargo is a sanction that would only affect the American farmer, and arguably, would affect the poor, black majority in South Africa. It would have no effect on the government on their policy," he said. "It might harm the very people that we're seeking to help, and it would very definitely harm the Kansas and American farmer."

Docking is in favor of the three main amendments facing voters in the upcoming election: liquor-by-the-drink, pari-mutuel betting, and a state lottery.

"I strongly favor it (liquor-by-the-drink). I feel it would be a modernization of the liquor laws, a streamlining of the liquor laws. It would allow us to have more effective enforcement of our liquor laws, and would encourage travel and tourism within the state," Docking said.

"Moreover, in any part of the state where the majority of the people do not want to have liquor-by-the-drink, it will not be forced upon them. It's only in those parts of the state where people want it," he said.

Passage of the state lottery amendment would allow for money which would be used for improvements in Kansas. The Legislature has constructed a formula which would divide any money collected from the lottery with 60 percent being allocated to economic development and job projects, 30 percent to roads and highways and 10 percent to prison construction, he said.

"I am in favor of the lottery as well. I view it as a significant revenue-raising measure. Without a general tax increase it will provide possibly $35 million in additional revenue that could be used for jobs

Scholarships will aid community, campus

The plan is to raise 1,000 scholarships of $1,000 each every year for the next three years.

The purpose of the scholarships is to draw students to the University to gain an education. Having more students at K-State means having more students purchase local goods and services.

Controversy has arisen about differing estimations of the amount of money that would be flowing into the community by the spending of these scholarship recipients. Some have estimated each dollar spent would change hands in the community six times, while others say each dollar would turn over no more than twice.

Regardless of the number of turnovers, the additional students at K-State would be a benefit to the Univeristy as well as the local community.

Manhattan's economy depends a great deal on the spending habits of the students and, ultimately, on K-State's enrollment.

The University's declining enrollment since 1982 has hurt Manhattan businesses. And the drop in the number of students is accompanied by a decrease in the number of faculty and staff members, who are also integral parts of Manhattan's economy.

With the creation of more scholarships, more students, and consequently faculty and staff, will be drawn to the University and the Manhattan area. No matter what the amount of money turned over locally, an increase in enrollment will ultimately help us all.

Expulsion of Soviets antagonizes relations

The United Nations is not a tool which the United States can use to hammer at the Soviet Union.

Wednesday, the Reagan administration sent 25 Soviet U.N. diplomats out of the country, claiming the action was not related to the Soviet Union holding reporter Nicholas Daniloff on spy charges.

The expulsion was part of a two-year plan made six months ago to reduce the size of the Soviet delegation to the U.N. The Soviet delegation was twice the size of the next largest delegation. This excuse is suspect because as a peace-keeping association, the number of diplomats at the U.N. from any nation should be irrelevant.

The plan was made not only to reduce the size of the Soviet delegation, but because the officials were believed to be engaged in spying.

A Department of State spokesman refused to say whether the 25 Soviets being sent home were engaged in spying. Lack of evidence perhaps?

If the plans were made six months ago, the entire staff reduction should have taken place then, especially if they were engaging in spy activities.

The expulsion comes at a time when U.S.-Soviet relations are strained because of the Daniloff case and because of pressure to begin arms negotiations.

Secretary of State George Shultz said Daniloff case has "put a cloud over Soviet-American relations." Yet the Reagan administration seems bent on turning that cloud into a thunderhead.

U.N. officials must not be subjected to political maneuvers of the superpowers.

Travis' decision helps optimism on campus

Athletic Director Larry Travis withdrew his name Tuesday from the list of candidates for the athletic director's position at the University of Florida.

Travis announced his decision to the University of Florida after a search committee recommended to their president's office that the search continue, rather than submitting Travis name for the position.

According to the Jacksonville Times-Union, Travis was considered the top candidate for the job because he was the only candidate who was an alumnus of the University of Florida.

Travis decision to withdraw his name from consideration is a boost to K-State's athletic program at a time when disappointment and discouragement are looming over the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

The athletic department ran a deficit of nearly $240,000 during the year ending June 30. Since Travis came to the University in 1985, he has been struggling to correct departmental budget problems that began before he arrived. Travis took on a task few would want when he became director of a department needing drastic cuts.

In addition to financial troubles, Travis is working with two new coaches of major sports — Stan Parrish and Lon Kruger — coaches of sports that cast national attention on universities. After a powerful opening win against Western Illinois, the Wildcat football team has lost momentum, but Travis made his decision to stay after the heartbreaking loss against Northern Iowa Saturday.

Travis said he set goals and made commitments when he came to K-State, and his decision to stay is tangible proof of that commitment. Although the athletic department's situation was surrounded with pessimism, it now has reason for optimism because of Travis' decision to remain at K-State.

Larry Travis should be commended for giving the athletic department a chance to rebuild.

Networks must alter programming

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

There aren't many of us who do not know about television. It's one of the driving forces in many people's lives and a definite influence on society.

How many times have you spent the day talking to people about the programs you viewed last night on TV? How many of you plan your classes around favorite daytime soap operas and your night classes around the prime-time schedule?

There are more television fanatics in our society than we care to admit. The ratings for network television may be slipping, but the numbers are still dramatic.

For the last two weeks and during the upcoming weeks, the three major networks are unveiling their new prime-time series and schedules. It would be to your benefit to pay attention to the new shows and to watch discriminately.

After all, we do have the power to make or break a show.

That's right. You, as the television consumer, have the right to choose what you want to see and to boycott what you choose. It's as simple as turning off the tube.

The networks have assumed for too many years the viewing public would be there no matter what. They figured we were so fascinated by the illusion and marvel of television that we would watch anything at anytime.

For a long time, they were right.

Then came the 1980s.

It has changed. Viewers and viewing habits of the American public have changed. It's too bad the networks won't change. The system, as it stands, may not last much longer. The public is finally getting through to the networks that the idea of the viewer always being there is not necessarily true.

The average rating for a prime-time show during the 1960s and early '70s was 33. In other words, 33 percent of the homes owning a television were tuned to a particular program at a given time. Currently, that rating has slipped to 17 — only 17 percent of the homes are tuning into a show.

What are the viewers doing if they are not watching standard television fare offered by the major three?

We're turning off the TV or doing other things. We're purchasing videocassette players, although industry insiders had predicted VCRs would fail. And cable television, including the pay channels, is capturing the viewing audience.

And why are we turning elsewhere for entertainment? That's hard to say; it depends on the person you talk to.

For some, the marvel of television is nonexistent. They just aren't thrilled with the electronic wonder of it all. For others, the idea of full-length, unedited movies is excitement itself, so they purchase VCRs, rent tapes or watch the pay movie channels.

For others, the quality of network television is simply at its lowest, so why waste the time? These people are probably in the majority.

The networks, to pull in higher ratings, have usually programmed for the lowest common denominator. In layman's terms, that means they think we're all dumb, so why should they produce intelligent, thoughtful, well-done drama? The only possible target market would be the upper-middle class and the super-rich — after all they are the only ones who can appreciate culture and the finer things in life.

The major three also have the bad habit of believing the audience will stay tuned to one station throughout the evening. Don't touch that dial! Didn't you know you aren't supposed to switch channels?

Of course, the audience decides what programs it prefers within one airing, so the networks only order three shows in a series. After all, if the overnight ratings state that a show wasn't watched, it never will be. The overnight ratings are compiled from research done in only nine major cities throughout the United States.

Don't get me wrong. My chosen profession is in the television industry. I'm still fascinated by the medium. It's a forceful means of communication, and I'm all for it.

I am, however, concerned with the quality of programming.

It's amazing how many people view the questionable shows the major networks throw our way. It's also amazing that the networks think we're really enjoying that stuff. How many times have we seen a really well-produced series appear and then completely disappear within a matter of weeks? Too often to count.

And what happened to the Golden Age of Television? Most industry experts claim (as does the audience) that the 1950s was the era when TV was at its greatest. So why can't it be during the 1980s, also?

It's time the networks realize the intelligence and potential of the television audience. It's time the TV consumer realizes he can do something about what is appearing on his TV screen. It's time the people involved in the industry realize we have to do something right or we'll lose the entire audience, probably forever.

Take time and browse a copy of the latest television listings and the new shows. Then take the time to view some of the programs you feel may be worth watching. If they are worth it, great. (There are a few, honest.) If not, turn the "boob tube" off, read a book, talk to a friend or take a walk. You don't have to watch the television just because it's there.

Playland discovered in U.S. image

DAN OWENS
Collegian Columnist

Andy Warhol once said something to the effect that the prettiest building in Washington, D.C., is McDonald's; the prettiest building in Paris is McDonald's. And Moscow? It doesn't have a pretty building.

If we accept Warhol's opinion on architecture, then I spent the afternoon of April 16, 1986, outside of the prettiest building in Giessen, West Germany. The U.S. bombing of Lybia had occurred the previous night and I was hanging around the golden arches to see if anything anti-American would turn up.

Demonstrations against the attack were going on at the University across town, but things at McDonald's were, if anything, quieter than usual. The highlight of the afternoon came when a West German friend appeared with a fresh Big Mac and said, "Well, Daniel, what has your lovely president done now?"

You may think what you like of President Reagan, but the man did not make my life in Europe any easier.

And the irony of that situation! There I sat outside McDonald's listening to a European criticize the politics of the United States while he munched on McNuggets. That scene goes a long way toward describing the United States' image abroad.

If you are of the opinion that one cannot generalize about a society or the opinions of its people, I suggest you move on to the personals, because I'm about to generalize. Images of the United States I will describe are some of those I came into contact with during the 14 months I lived in Europe. There is no shortage of Europeans on this campus with whom one can discuss my observations.

One of the first things I noticed in Europe was the popularity of American television, radio and films. Two of the most popular U.S. productions are "Dallas" and "Dynasty," which are broadcast all over Europe in several languages. I once saw a cardboard J.R. selling Heineken beside a canal in Amsterdam, and the West Germans are now producing their own prime-time soap, "Black Forest Clinic."

Some people expressed their concerns over these shows; Americans spend more time dreaming of a glamorous lifestyle instead of doing something about poverty in the United States. It is difficult to convince a foreigner that the wealth of Southfork Ranch and the poverty of an Indian reservation are both sad extremes, and the good life in the United States lies somewhere between the two.

I heard positive things about the acceptance of foreigners in the United States. Students and workers from four continents described to me a greater degree of tolerance of outsiders in the United States than they found in Europe. That is a trait Americans should be proud of and encourage.

Something we need to work on is the militaristic image the U.S. media and politics project abroad. I had a fun time in East Germany and the Soviet Union explaining the popularity of video war games, recent Sylvester Stallone movies and why Army fatigues came into fashion. Like "Dynasty," most Americans probably regard these things as harmless, but many people from other lands think they reflect dangerous tendencies in U.S. society.

"Rambo" has actually become a new word in many European languages including German, French, Italian and Swedish. Just as in English, "Rambo" is used around the globe to describe a foreign policy or manner of conduct that rejects political solutions in favor of militaristic ones.

In Germany, Reagan seems most popular with older people, many of whom have a strong affection for the United States resulting from their experiences with the Marshall Plan or the actions of the Soviet Union following World War II.

The younger generation is much more critical of the politics of the United States. That April day I asked my friend if he thought the youth in West Germany disliked the United States. He laughed and said, "Look around you. What are the kids drinking? Coke. T-shirts with Mickey Mouse or Snoopy on them are very popular. 'Back to the Future' was a box-office hit in Europe, and lots of students want to visit the Grand Canyon, Yosemite National Park or San Francisco. This generation doesn't care for current U.S. politics, but they love your country."

His observations reinforced some of my notions of the United States' image abroad. I came to describe my country's image in one word — "playland." If you want to forget the problems of the world and just have a good time, the United States is the place to be. Unfortunately, if one has the money, this image can easily become a reality.

But the problems of the world are very real, whether or not we choose to forget them. The enormous power of the United States will affect these problems either positively or negatively; remaining neutral is simply not possible.

If everyone here plays around now, or the world perceives our population to be a bunch of unconcerned pleasure-seekers, then government leaders will begin to disregard the lofty ideals on which that "playland" is based.

Then we may not be playing for long.

University instructor accepts state secretary post

By TOM SCHULTES
Agriculture Editor

TOPEKA — After a day of speculation throughout the state, Sam Brownback, cooperative extension agriculture law specialist, was announced to be the new Kansas Secretary of Agriculture.

Brownback, 30, is also an attorney and partner in the Manhattan law firm of Stites, Hill, Wilson and Brownback.

The announcement was made during a Thursday morning press conference at the offices of the Kansas Board of Agriculture by Floyd Coen, president of the board.

Brownback succeeds Harland Priddle, who resigned in June to run unsuccessfully for the lieutenant governor post with gubernatorial candidate Jack Brier. Priddle's term in the post would have expired in January, 1988.

After the announcement was made, Brownback said he was honored that the board selected him for the posititon.

"I feel extremely fortunate to be the one selected," Brownback said.

He said the board's marketing division would continue to work in conjunction with other economic development organizations in the state.

"We look forward to working with the Legislature, the governor and the agricultural leadership to accomplish this goal," Brownback said.

He said the board, including himself, "will do everything possible to help the agriculture industry grow and develop so that it and its people will prosper.

"We will do everything possible to help agriculture grow," Brownback said.

Brownback said the state's agriculture sector should be "very aggressive" in both international and domestic marketing of its products, noting that only one-third of the state's corn is used within the state.

Sam Brownback

"We just can't consume all the corn grown here," Brownback said.

When asked about sales to South Africa, he said the state should sell grain "anywhere we possibly can." He added that decisions as to what are deemed acceptable markets are determined at the federal level.

Brownback said personnel at K-State were "very good about (the new position)."

He said transitions, such as finding a new instructor for his Agricultural Law and Finance class, were still being worked out. Brownback said he would be moving to Topeka and starting the new position as soon as possible.

Coen said Brownback, whose first official day for the job is Oct. 15, will be receiving a starting salary of between $48,000 and $52,000. He said final contracts have not yet been signed.

Carole Jordan, public information officer for the Board of Agriculture, said Priddle's salary had been $54,000.

On the issue of pari-mutuel betting on the November ballot, Brownback said the board is a non-political entity, and he would follow the policy of not having a declared stand on the issue.

Brownback, who has been active in the Republican Party, said he will "sever all of those ties." But, he added, participation in politics was a duty of citizens, although "too few" people are involved in it.

As for future political plans, Brownback said, "I will not demean this office to use it as a political stepping stone."

When asked about his age being an issue to the public, Brownback said, "It's not the years; it's the mileage that counts."

He said he has a lot of energy to contribute, and hopes his gaining the position will be seen "as a message to young agriculturalists across the state" that the board believes in the future of agriculture.

"I hope it will be seen as an asset," Brownback said.

Coen said the selection process included accepting 74 applications between June 15 and Aug. 15, with interviews conducted during the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson.

Brownback, reared on a farm near Parker, is a 1979 K-State graduate with a degree in agriculture economics.

Ag college views selection as beneficial

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Although many agree his leaving will be a loss for the University, Sam Brownback's appointment as Kansas Secretary of Agriculture is seen as beneficial to the agricultural community.

Brownback will bring young, new ideas to the Kansas Board of Agriculture as the new agriculture secretary, said Don Good, professor of animal sciences and industry.

"Sam is a very capable man," Good said. "He is young, articulate in agriculture, has a law degree and I think he will do a good job."

Good said he was surprised by the decision, to a degree, because of Brownback's youth, but added that youth is advantageous and in this case will be good for Kansas agriculture.

Officials approve secretary's qualities

"We (the College of Agriculture) are highly pleased that a distinguished ag alumni has been selected for this key leadership position in Kansas agriculture," said David Mugler, associate dean of the College of Agriculture.

"Sam has tremendous leadership qualities and capacity and will handle the position like it has been handled in the past," Mugler said.

"The College of Agriculture does, however, regret losing an excellent classroom teacher," Mugler said.

Brownback teaches agricultural law at K-State, a course in the Department of Agricultural Economics, said Marc Johnson, professor of agriculture economics. Brownback has also done work for the Cooperative Extension Service in the agriculture law area.

"Sam will provide a good agriculture perspective because he grew up on a farm, got an ag degree in agriculture economics and his specialty is ag law," Johnson said.

"Sam is a very positive and forward thinking person and his concern for people will help in the current agriculture crisis," Johnson said.

"We (the College of Agriculture) are really going to miss him," said Miles McKee, professor of animal sciences and industry. "He does such a fine job teaching the ag law class."

McKee said Brownback has expertise in three areas that will benefit Kansas agriculture.

The first, cited by McKee, is his leadership abilities, followed by an agriculture background. The third area, McKee said, is Brownback's understanding of laws.

"Above all," McKee said, "I think Sam is a great young man and he will continue the tradition of fine state agriculture secretaries."

Brownback's leaving will be a substantial loss to the College of Agriculture, Johnson said.

Debate set to consider 'Star Wars'

By The Collegian Staff

The National Society of Professional Engineers will be hosting a debate on the "Star Wars" issue Monday at 3:30 p.m. in Pasley Lecture Hall in Durland.

Alvin Compaan, professor of physics, and Hermann Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering, will present their views concerning the Strategic Defense Initiative.

Compaan will be expressing his opposition to the "Star Wars" program. He has conducted research in the field of lasers and their effects on materials. He has also helped distribute a petition asking scientists not to solicit or accept funds from SDI, said Darin George, graduate in nuclear engineering and president of K-State chapter of NSPE.

Donnert has been involved with defense-related reasearch for 29 years and has studied the effects of radiation on optical parts that might be used in the program.

This regular meeting of the NSPE is open to the public.

The purpose of the NSPE is to promote "students' professional development," George said.

For-profit care units show same results with lower costs

Hospital chains cut out hidden subsidies, study concludes

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Money-making hospital chains are more efficient than their non-profit counterparts, which are propped up by hidden public subsidies and driven by "a physicians' cartel" to waste money, a researcher concluded.

"It's clear that the for-profit hospitals provide the same results at lower costs than do the non-profit hospitals," said Regina Herzlinger, an economist at the Harvard Business School.

Her report, to be published early next year in the Harvard Business Review, is the latest in an often-emotional debate over which kind of hospitals best serve the public interest. Investor-owned chains have grown rapidly in the last two decades, along with other kinds of clinics and medical groups that provide health care at a profit.

Herzlinger argues that non-profit hospitals operate mainly to serve the doctors who practice there, at the expense of the institutions' long-term financial health.

"The non-profits are much more short-sighted than the for-profits," she said Wednesday at a seminar for journalists. "The reason they exist is not because they provide benefits to patients but because they provide benefits to doctors. There is a physicians' cartel that supports the non-profit hospitals. The reason they support them is that they make their lives easier."

They do this, she said, by supplying more empty beds and providing larger support staffs.

Her analysis was based on a comparison of about 500 acute-care community hospitals, all of them in profit-making or non-profit chains, between 1977 and 1981. About 90 percent of for-profit hospitals in the United States are in chains, compared with about a third of non-profit hospitals. The study, which cost an estimated $125,000, was paid for by Harvard Business School.

Dr. Arnold S. Relman, a frequent critic of the profit motive in medicine, criticized the study for ignoring the majority of the nation's non-profit hospitals, especially those that operate in poor, city neighborhoods.

"The for-profits have chosen a certain lifestyle — small hospitals, no tertiary care, in non-center cities, in economically healthy areas where there aren't any poor people," he said. "If you compare them to the not-for-profit hospitals that have chosen the same lifestyle, then you didn't see much of a difference. The fact of the matter is, the vast majority of beds in not-for-profits are not in small, clean suburbs."

Relman is editor of the New England Journal of Medicine. His magazine has published studies concluding that non-profit hospitals are just as efficient, and in some ways cheaper, than those that make money.

Herzlinger contends those studies were flawed, because they failed to consider the age and real value of the hospital's assets, as well as the subsidies they receive.

She said non-profit hospitals get "social subsidies," largely because they don't pay taxes. The for-profit hospitals are subsidized, too, in the form of investment tax credits and accelerated depreciation allowances.

She calculated that 17 cents of every dollar invested in a non-profit hospital originates from a social subsidy. But these account for only 2 cents of every dollar invested in the for-profit chains.

The non-profit hospitals, she said, "are propped up by a hidden subsidy. Their costs appear to be lower, but they are not."

She noted that many profit-making chain hospitals were built during the 1970s, while the non-profit hospitals frequently have buildings that date from the 1950s and '60s. The for-profit chains are paying for their newer assets, while the non-profit ones are not replacing aging structures.

Herzlinger said her work shows that non-profit hospitals charge as much as the for-profit chains, and there is no difference in the kind of insurance their patients carry.

Relman dismissed the idea that the investor-owned chains are more efficient.

Tough foes await K-State in tourney

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State's volleyball squad faces its stiffest competition of the young season when it competes in the Quality Inn Classic at Las Cruces, N.M., this weekend.

After a second-place finish in the Kansas State Invitational last weekend, the Wildcat spikers will face Ohio State, New Mexico State and Texas Tech in the tournament.

The 'Cats, 4-2, open the tournament Friday against the Buckeyes of Ohio State. The third-place and championship matches will be Saturday evening.

"All three opponents are really going to challenge us," Coach Scott Nelson said. "I look at it not so much out of a fear, but more of an opportunity to compete against top teams from the South region as well as the Mideast region.

"The experience is still something we need, because when we enter Big Eight play, this is what we're facing. It's really an opportunity to see how good we are, and how successful we can be at a high-level tournament."

Nelson said the team's attitude is positive as it prepares for its third tournament this season.

"I think we feel like we made some improvement over the weekend. At our team meeting Monday, we talked about the weekend, and the general consensus was that we've improved our team skills. We've started to compete as a team under pressure," he said.

Nelson said he is well aware of the problem he faces in the team's initial match against Ohio State. The Buckeyes have already beaten some top-caliber teams in Illinois State and Northern Illinois.

"They have some talent, they have some depth, and they have some experience. You don't beat Illinois State and Northern Illinios without being, first of all, a good team, and then having the talent," he said. "There's no doubt about it, they're going to be our toughest match to date."

New Mexico State, 5-2, has lost twice to a tough Hawaii squad.

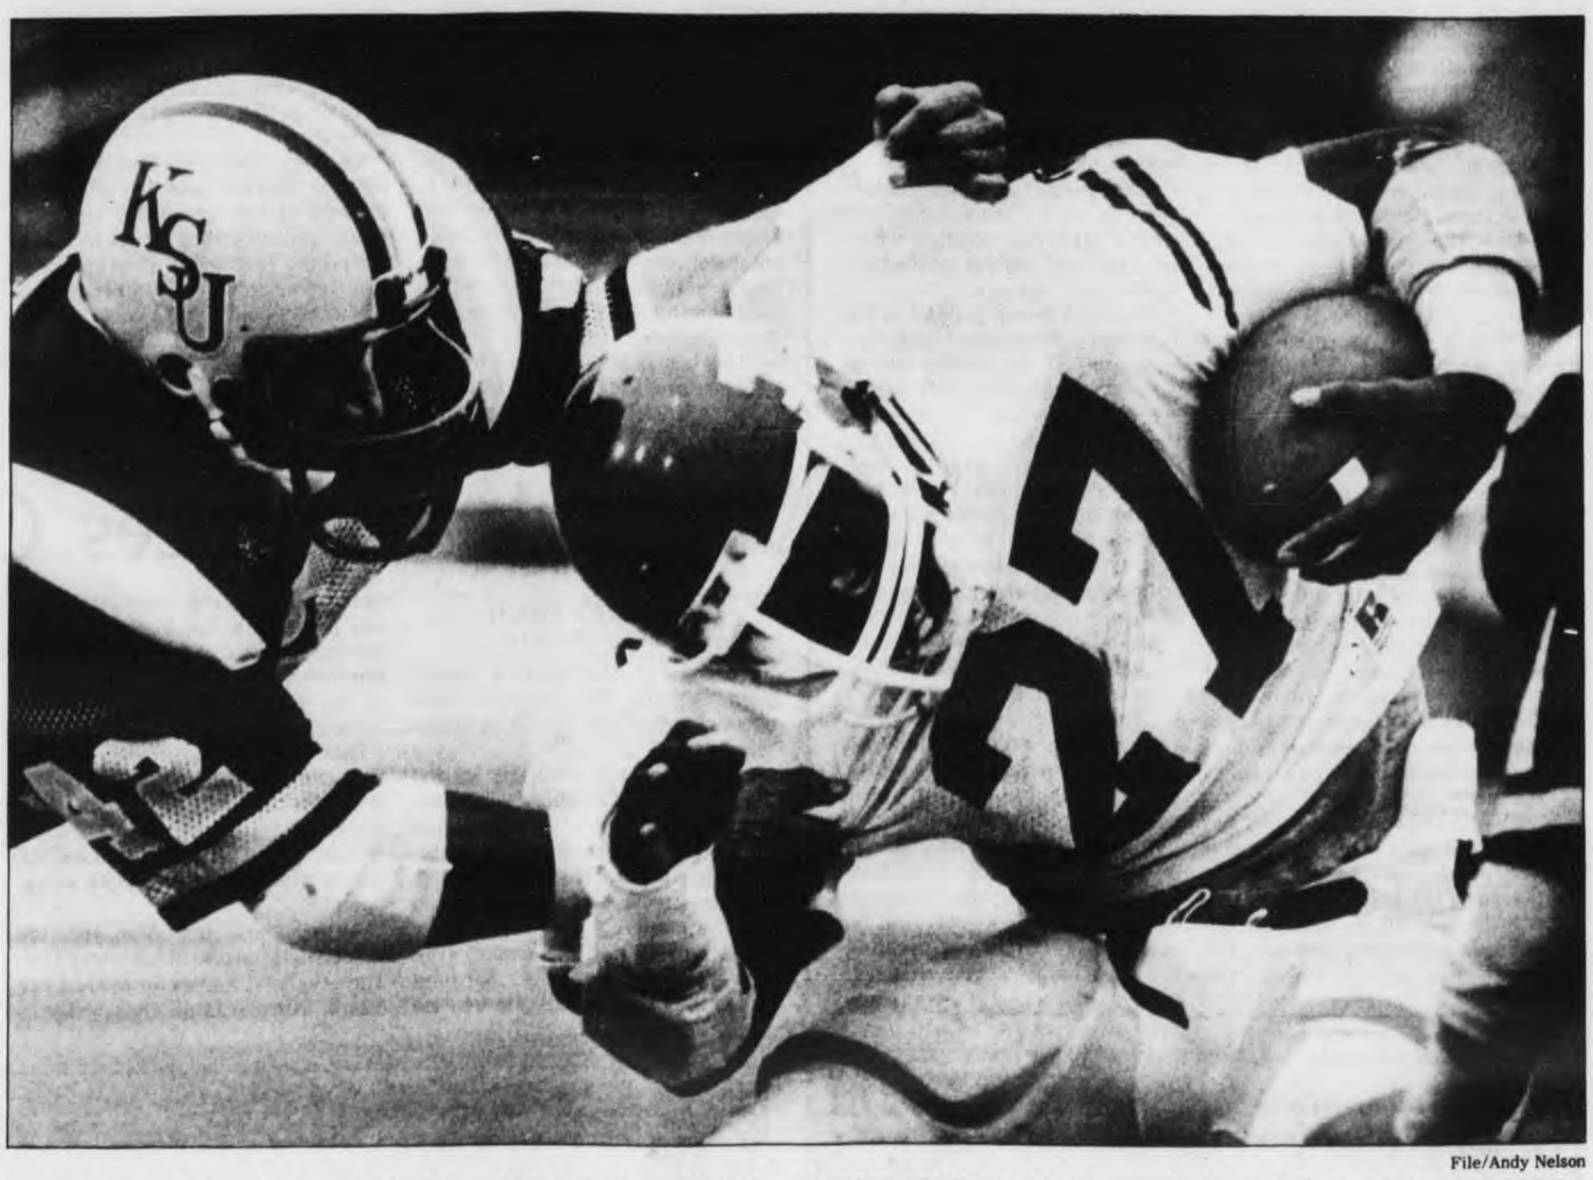
"New Mexico State is probably very similar to us in a lot of respects. They've beaten some competition they should be beating (and) they've lost to a real tough team...twice, just as we lost to Northwestern," Nelson said.

Texas Tech, however, appears to be the team to beat in the tournament.

"Texas Tech is probably the hottest team right now in the South," Nelson said.

He added that the Red Raiders are also the most experienced team in the tournament, listing five juniors and a senior in the starting lineup.

Tech has already beaten three national powers — Purdue, Oklahoma and Southern Illinois — in three straight games each.



Nelson's biggest concern is how his squad has played together as a team. But he has been pleased with the play of several individual players.

"I think Cindy Durham has really been coming on lately. She's gaining a lot of confidence," he said. "Shawnee (Call) continues to play at a high level. I think those two players right now are really standing out in my mind."

Nelson said he has a definite goal for his team in the tournament.

"What I want after this weekend (is) to come out feeling like we played within our system better than we did last weekend, against better competition," he said.

"(That) will really prepare us for the opening of Big Eight play."

Texas Christian University's running back Tony Jeffery (27) is considered by Coach Stan Parrish to be "one of the top running backs in the Southwest Conference." Jeffery will be the man to stop as K-State will go up against the Horned Frogs Saturday in Fort Worth.

Stopping TCU running back vital if Wildcats plan to win

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Texas Christian's Tony Jeffery is as modest about his accomplishments as any running back who rushed for 343 yards the previous week can be.

Included in Jeffery's statistics from last week's 48-31 win at Tulane were touchdown runs of 11, 38, 32, 81 and 67 yards. Three of Jeffery's touchdowns came on three consecutive carries in the third quarter. In the third quarter alone, Jeffery accounted for 151 yards rushing.

"It was a good game (for me), but it was a great game for other people, too," Jeffery said. "I just had a good day and the blocking was good and the receivers had great downfield blocking."

K-State travels Saturday night to Fort Worth to face Jeffery and TCU.

TCU Coach Jim Wacker isn't quite as restrained when asked to comment on Jeffery's performance, which ranks as the best in Southwest Conference history and the sixth best all-time in NCAA Division I-A. Wacker termed Jeffery's game "the most amazing demonstration of running I have ever witnessed."

"It's really kind of unbelievable when you think about it all. Tony went through such a frustrating...a distracted year last year (only 693 yards rushing after gaining 840 in 1984 as a freshman)," Wacker said.

"And here we were Saturday, (with) two quarterbacks injured and the only healthy one still a little shellshocked; playing two redshirt freshmen on the left side of our offensive line; and operating with the regular right halfback, T.J.'s ace blocker (Tommy Palmer), still on the sidelines. Who would have ever dreamed of Tony running for 343 yards under those circumstances?"

Coach Stan Parrish called Jeffery "one of the top running backs in the Southwest Conference." Parrish's hope is that Jeffery has gotten a bit caught up in the attention that comes to a back who gains 343 yards in a game.

"I hope his head is getting really big this week from all that," Parrish said.

Parrish does have some ideas on how K-State can attempt to shut down the potent Horned Frog veer option offense, which also includes multitalented quarterback Scott Ankrom.

"We have a lot of little different little things planned," Parrish said. "We don't want to play like Tulane. They let those backs run through there clean. In the option, you like to get people in the lanes and try to create some fumbles. If they're lazy mentally, that may happen because that's what leads to fumbles in the option game."

The 31 points TCU gave up to Tulane represent an encouraging sign for K-State.

"They did give up some points. I'm sure their defense will be working their butts off this week," Parrish said. "You like winning, but you don't like giving up 31 points, either."

Last week, K-State's offense was shut out by NCAA Division I-AA Northern Iowa 17-0.

"We were uptight last week; we were nervous. If I had it to do all over again, I'd psychologically do it a little differently," Parrish said. "I'd try to be more patient with them during the week, play up more good things."

The Horned Frogs are the second SWC team K-State will meet this season. Texas Tech blasted the 'Cats 41-7 two weeks ago at Lubbock.

"They're opposites. Texas Tech was a throwing team and (TCU) is a running club," Parrish said.

GAME NOTES: Game time at Amon Carter Stadium is 7:30 p.m. Saturday...Radio broadcasts of the game can be heard locally on KMKF (101.7 FM) or WIBW (580 AM)...Among the lineup changes for K-State this week will be Steve Compton in place of Craig Christlieb at one cornerback, Eric Harper sharing time with Willie Halliburton at the other cornerback and Jim Oehm replacing Rick Lewis at noseguard...Linebacker David Wallace, who sustained a knee injury in the Western Illinois game will make the trip to Fort Worth and may see action, depending on how the game goes, Parrish said.

Donohue leads 'Cats to victories

Behind the hitting of third baseman Jim Donohue, the K-State baseball team defeated Barton County Community College 11-1 and 8-2 in a doubleheader Wednesday night at Frank Myers Field.

Donohue was one of five 'Cats to get two hits during the opener. Jeff Peterson collected the win after tossing four innings in relief and giving up one hit.

In the second game, Paul Iseman and Darryl Rowley combined to throw a five-hitter. Rowley earned the win while striking out seven in five innings.

Rugby, soccer teams to host games

The K-State rugby and soccer club teams will be in action this weekend.

The rugby team will host Southwest Missouri State on Saturday. The game will start at 1 p.m. and be played on the rugby field adjacent to the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

The soccer team will host Wichita State at 1 p.m. Saturday and play Iowa State at noon Sunday. Both games will be played at Memorial Stadium. Also Sunday, the squad's second team will face Topeka United at 1 p.m. in Topeka.

Student-athletes must defeat pressures both on playing field and in classroom

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Editor's Note: This is the final article in a five-part series titled "College Athletics in America."

Collegiate athletes are expected to perform gallantly on the playing field for their schools. Too often though, it is forgotten that those athletes also must perform well in the classroom.

Coaches must constantly worry about their players maintaining the minimum 1.80 grade point average in order to be eligible under National Collegiate Athletic Association rules.

With the athlete's time split between practices, games, attending classes and preparing for exams, the pressure placed on the individual can be quite consuming.

"I don't think people in the mainstream of a university begin to realize the incredible pressure student-athletes are under — it's enormous," University President Jon Wefald said. "In many cases, they are the most visible students on campus and people are looking at them without realizing they are just people, like anyone else."

"If you come here as a highly recruited athlete and everyone knows who you are, there's tremendous pressure on you to succeed. If you just make a little mistake, people are going to jump all over you."

Athletic Director Larry Travis realizes athletes are under pressure both on and off the field, but he prefers not to say his athletes are under any more pressure than any other member of the K-State student body.

"The pressure college students are under is pretty universal," Travis said. "There is pressure in the classroom, and the athlete is exposed to the pressures of competing. There are different pressures on different people; I think we make too much of the pressures student-athletes are under."

Jim Epps and Steve Hall work for the athletic department in the athletic assistance unit. The two are charged with monitoring the classroom progress of Wildcat athletes.

"We are a service to the student-athlete. Any way we can assist them to achieve their academic goals and desires is what we are here to do," Hall said. "There is a lot of pressure on these people...,(but) it is more than just academics. We are here to provide support and assistance to these people."

Travis said K-State athletes are required to attend study halls aimed at tutoring them on subjects which are of a concern.

"You would be surprised. Most athletes do better in season than out of season, because of the discipline involved in having their hours set," Travis said.

Many athletic programs have been accused of bringing in athletes, and when their athletic eligibility ends, the coaches lose concern for whether or not the player obtains a degree.

Travis recognized there have been programs which have done exactly that, but he also thinks people expect too much when they look at the graduation rate of athletes in a particular program.

"What's the normal graduation rate of the student body? Bring in 3000 students and the graduation rate will be about 50 percent. So why should you think a group of athletes should graduate at 90 percent?" Travis said.

Travis points out that in an effort to make K-State athletes well-rounded individuals, most K-State coaches now require their players to either live in a residence hall or in a greek house.

Former K-State running back Veryl Switzer, who is now director of minority affairs, thinks Travis' decision will be important for the overall education of those student-athletes.

"It's important that the athletes get involved in the mainstream of student life," Switzer said. "(So few become professionals), so they have to have other options. (The athletes) have to take it in their own hands and dedicate the time, hurt and long hours to get a degree."

"You know intercollegiate athletics is just too big for its own good," Wefald said. "It has become such an extravaganza, that we've lost sight of what academics is all about.

"It's time to put intercollegiate athletics in perspective. It is more important to be a success off the court than on the court," Wefald said.

Young 'Cat teams set for 2nd meet

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

It's the same song, second verse, for the men's and women's cross country teams this weekend when they venture down I-70 to compete in the Jayhawk Invitational on Saturday.

Like last weekend, cross country coach John Capriotti will, for the most part, take a group of young untested runners to Lawrence to race. He is trying to save his top runners for meets later on the season to reduce injuries and keep each runner at full strength for the post-season portion of the schedule.

"It is a low-key meet for us," Capriotti said.

The men's team will enter the Kansas meet with a group of middle distance track runners who Capriotti said wanted some work this weekend. "These are guys who don't normally run cross country for us," Capriotti said.

In addition, Capriotti will wait another couple of weeks before he unveils Swedish import Jan Jonsson and junior Jim Knudsen. Knudsen is recuperating from back ailments and Jonsson is resting after an exhausting European circuit this summer.

The women's squad will feature Betsy Silzer, a 32nd place finisher in the 1984 National Collegiate Athletic Association national meet and a redshirt last season, and another Swedish product, Anelli Edling. The rest of the women will be freshmen.

The doctor's report is still out on K-State's All-Everything runner Jacque Struckhoff. Capriotti said Struckhoff is running everyday and it is "leaning more towards that she will (run this year).

"There is a lot of time (left in the season). Right now, it is more mental than physical," he said.

Although Capriotti is going to Lawrence with a reduced lineup, he said he believes his teams are strong enough and have enough depth to win each of their divisions. Last week the men brought back a first-place trophy and the women grabbed second-place honors at Missouri with young, untested lineups.

"I expect to go down there with our men's middle distance team and compete," Capriotti said. "We don't have to back down from anybody. A lot of the good teams compete with (middle distance) runners competing for them."

The track and cross country mentor is still pointing towards the KSU Open on Sept. 27 as his first prime meet. That is the first meet he plans to "bring out all the troops."

If Capriotti keeps getting the kind of performances from his young runners he did last weekend, he will be able to sit back and enjoy watching his team's depth beat most teams.

Dorm menus to add 'trendier' food items

By ROGER MCKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

In an attempt to enhance services for the students, Kramer and Derby Food Centers will add soft drinks and more trendy food items to their menus, said Mary Molt, administrative dietitian and director of Derby Food Center.

For the first time in the residence hall's history, the food service will soon be providing soft drinks with meals, Molt said.

"Within a month, there will be pop dispensers in the food centers. This is in response to the residents' wishes," she said. "Students are drinking more and more soft drinks now, with some of the students coming from homes where they were raised on pop."

With the addition of the soft drinks, Molt said she anticipates a drop in milk consumption. But, as in other universities, this figure will come back up.

The food service is also responding to the fast-food crazes sweeping America, Molt said, by adding more of the trendy-type meals to the menu.

"We will be continuing our Taco Tuesday nights, which have been very popular with the residents in the past. On Friday evening we will be adding a sub-n-sundae night, in correspondence with the 'happy hour' attitude the students have," she said. "We are also planning more of the traditional Mexican and Oriental buffets this year."

Another item added to the food center was the elaborate salad bar with homemade soups and breads, she said.

"Along that same idea, we are going to start a baked potato line with a variety of toppings, which are also very popular on the fast-food scene," she said.

The most recent project in the food service's planning stage is a commercial bakeshop to be located in the basement of Derby. Molt said the bakery will sell a variety of baked goods including cookies, cakes, muffins and breads directly to the residents.

"The students will be able to see the goods being mixed, dipped and baked, somewhat like the bakeshops you see in the malls," she said.

Most of the changes were initiated by 12 professional dietitians and staff, Molt said.

"The changes are based on research, preferences and food trends of America, while working directly with the students in the residence hall," she said.

The residence hall food service is run independently on a non-profit basis, Molt said. The unused money from one year will be put back into the service, creating the funds to make these changes.

Former hostage advises negotiations necessary

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Hostages who remain captive in Lebanon are being held against a demand Americans cannot possibly meet, but this should not forestall meaningful negotiations with the terrorists, says one of the 52 hostages held by Iranians for 444 days.

Moorhead Kennedy, who was an acting economic counselor for the U.S. Foreign Service when the U.S. Embassy in Tehran was seized Nov. 4, 1979, said the United States should not negotiate with terrorists on unacceptable terms, but must listen to their concerns to avoid soliciting future threats.

"The hostages now being held in Lebanon are being held against a demand that we could not possibly meet, which is for us to pressure Kuwait to release 17 Shiite terrorists who had blown up the U.S. and French embassies," Kennedy said. "There is no way we can meet that demand, but that does not mean that you cannot negotiate."

"Whether we're buying a house or a car, we have our up front demand, we have what our real need is and we have what we're going to settle for," he said.

Kennedy, 55, who has left the foreign service and is executive director of the Council for International Understanding, spoke to about 250 people Wednesday night at a program sponsored by the International Relations Council of Kansas City.

He said terrorists aren't unlike early American revolutionaries, but they couple this with an ideology of nationalism and religion.

"Their target is the United States, which they regard as a colonial country, not that we control land masses like the French and British did, but that our culture, our ideas, our way of life — the television serial 'Dallas' — undermines their sense of identity and makes it harder for them to establish the kind of societies they want to establish," he said.

He said that during his captivity, he was struck by his captors' mixed attitudes toward the United States.

"Every hostage remembers being told by his captors: 'We hate the United States, but we like Americans.' They admire what we've accomplished. They want our technology. They don't want our values," Kennedy said. "So at the same time that they welcome us in, they are driving us out."

In November 1984, Kennedy said he appeared on a news program, and via satellite, was faced with one of his captors. Kennedy said he asked his former captor why the Iranians took over the American Embassy in Tehran, and the student answered:

"When I was a student in the United States, most of my classmates didn't know where Iran was, but now every American does. They now know what Iran stands for — that we're eastern, not western."

At a luncheon program earlier in the day, Kennedy said the United States must push for a peaceful accord between Israel and the Arab world. He said the United States also must show a willingness to understand Palestinian efforts to establish a homeland and recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization as a more moderate voice for the Palestinian people.

Award recognizes Community Garden

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

Sponsors of Manhattan's largest public garden celebrated national honors for their efforts at a reception Thursday.

The reception officially recognized the Manhattan Community Garden, Ninth and Riley streets, for receiving the National Large Site Award sponsored by the American Community Garden Association and the Glad Bag Corporation.

The garden won the award over 1500 other community gardens across the United States. The contest has been in existence for three years and presents $1,000 to the winning garden. The two previous winners of the contest were community gardens in San Francisco in 1984 and New York City in 1985.

Dick Mattson, professor of horticulture; Paul Sanford, chairman of the garden; Manhattan Mayor Rick Mann; Shari Kuenzi, garden coordinator; and Paul Scearcy from the University for Man all spoke at the ceremony.

Awards are not new for the Manhattan Garden. It has won a five-state regional contest for the last two years, Kuenzi said. These awards were also sponsored by the American Community Garden Association and gave the Manhattan garden two $500 prizes.

The garden "gives pride to the Manhattan community," Mattson said.

The garden was founded on Feb. 8, 1974, and located at a small area at Ninth and Riley streets, Mattson said. The garden grew east and west and now encompasses 2 acres and 170 plots.

The old, young, low-income and minorities all have a chance to lease a plot in the community garden, he said.

"We rent plots on a sliding scale fee," said Kuenzi. The scale is based on the ability of the leasee to pay.

"The garden is truly a community effort with fun and exciting results," Mann said.

He said the greatest joy was in the community sharing the garden which is special to many people. Mann said he will help in carrying on the winning tradition.

"It's always fun to beat San Francisco and New York," he said.

The garden was originally established by UFM, but sponsors stress the cooperation between the city, UFM and the University.

Auditors say defense contractors still overcharge Pentagon

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense contractors are still overcharging the Pentagon by millions of dollars a year despite stepped-up auditing, the General Accounting Office and Pentagon auditors agreed Thursday.

The waste arises because contractors are not providing enough information to the Defense Department in cases where non-competitive contracts are awarded, the two agencies told a House subcommittee.

In a review of 19 contracts awarded between 1982 and 1986, "we found problems in all 19 contractors," said a report by the General Accounting Office, the congressional investigative agency.

The GAO report was buttressed by William Reed, director of the Defense Contract Audit Agency, which reviews many of the millions of contracts awarded to be sure the government is being fairly treated.

The Reagan administration, as part of its Pentagon spending buildup, has increased the number of audits to try to catch contractors that cheat the government.

But during fiscal 1985, said Reed, "one of of every two contractors selected for Defense Contract Audit Agency audits were found to be defective."

Reed and the GAO testifed before the House Government Operations national security subcommittee, one of the many congressional panels investigating waste in the Defense Department.

The hearing involved the 1962 Truth-in-Negotiations Act, which requires contractors to furnish all relevent pricing information to government agencies in cases where non-competitive contracts are awarded.

The Reagan administration has pushed for an increase in competition among defense contractors in the face of criticism that money is being wasted on sole-source contracts. When the Pentagon buys an entire weapon from a single company, the contractor supplies information to support the contract figures.

James P. Wade, assistant secretary of defense for logistics, defended the Pentagon's oversight of contractors. He told the subcommittee that the Pentagon "has properly implemented" the 1962 law and is "constantly on the alert for ways" to save money.

But Rep. Jack Brooks, D-Texas, chairman of the subcommittee, criticized what he said are "widespread and costly violations" of the 1962 law.

"Since a large number of Pentagon contracts are awarded without competition," said Brooks, "contract prices must be based on cost and price estimates. By giving the government the right to equal knowledge of all facts affecting contract prices, Congress sought to ensure reasonable prices in negotiated contracts."

Frank Conahan, head of GAO's national security branch, told the subcommittee that the GAO review of the 19 contractors showed that "prices may be overstated by as much as $14 million because contractors did not disclose pertinent pricing information" to Pentagon contract reviewers.

Pentagon "contracting officers were not always provided pertinent and timely cost or pricing data," said Conahan. "In fact, we found many cases where contractors had more accurate, complete and current data that indicated lower prices than those proposed to the government."

If those Pentagon officials "had the data, we believe they would have had a sound basis for negotiating lower contract prices," he said.

Reed said his audit group has increased its review of contractors in response to congressional complaints that contractors needed closer scrutiny.

In fiscal 1985, the last full year, said Reed, the Pentagon issued about 100,000 contracts.

When Pentagon auditors challenge a contract, Reed noted, that starts a lengthy review process.

programs, highways, highway construction and prison construction," Docking said.

"We're losing money to our neighboring states," he said. "They're going across the border to buy these tickets and that's flat money that's leaving the state.

"I think these are all going to be good for the state, pari-mutuel betting included. It will encourage change, and growth and progress and competition," he said.

In looking into the future of Kansas, Docking said there is a need for cooperation between businesses in Kansas and the government.

"The business community will have to form partnerships with the education community to form solutions to many of our problems," he said.

"Most of the jobs in the future will come from within. Most of the jobs that will come are expansion of existing business, and existing small business. Over 80 percent of the employers in the state of Kansas employ 20 or fewer workers," Docking said.

"We have to pursue jobs that are outside of the state, but regardless of whether we get the big ones we ought to be aiming for the small ones and those who are within the state and considering expanding within the state," he said.

Docking is optimistic about his campaign prospects.

"I sense a lot of movement toward my campaign," he said.

The 51-year-old reporter was arrested Aug. 30 by KGB agents after a package containing maps marked "secret" were thrust on him. He was held in prison for two weeks and released to the custody of U.S. Ambassador Arthur A. Hartman last Friday.

In a message to Gorbachev, Reagan had appealed that Daniloff should be allowed to come home to the United States. The Soviet leader did not heed the request.

In his first public comment, Gorbachev referred to Daniloff as "the spy who was caught red-handed" and said Americans were trying to use it "to spoil relations...and to fan up hatred."

But in what could be a signal that he was prepared to compromise, Gorbachev also said "we will not become nervous and will not be provoked."

Similarly, on his arrival here, Shevardnadze said he believed the case could be resolved. The Soviet foreign minister did not elaborate.

He said, meanwhile, that preparations for a summit meeting between Reagan and Gorbachev were 50 percent complete.

The two leaders agreed last November at their first meeting in Geneva to hold back-to-back summits in Washington this year and in Moscow in 1987.

The Daniloff case — and its bitter aftermath — have contributed to the uncertainty, according to U.S. officials.

ference room, $379,800; a north annex, including VIP space overlooking the football field, concession area and an additional hospitality area, $235,985; fluted block inner concourse wall, $41,317; 48-feet stage curtains, $44,160; concrete apron for east and west parking areas, $46,500; three flagpoles with lights, $8,550; and retractable seats, $119,410.

Hein said total footage of the proposed coliseum will be 251,050 square feet. The 13,500 seat structure will be the fourth largest coliseum in the Big Eight Conference.

Hein said contracting bids for the coliseum will be opened in Topeka on Tuesday. This will be the second time the project has been bid.

In August 1985, the low bid on a 16,000 seat coliseum came in $3.4 million above estimates. Gossen Livingston Associates of Wichita, architects for the coliseum, were authorized to redesign the coliseum.

The three major networks, ABC, CBS and NBC, are in the process of displaying their new fall collection of shows guarenteed (they hope) to sweep viewers right off their collective feet and into a comfortable chair for the duration of the season. But, of the 23 new series offered among the "Big 3," only six will survive the wrath of the Nielson ratings. On page four are the insiders' picks, as well as the reporter's own bets on which will survive.

Music Review

Chaka gains new control over destiny

By DERON JOHNSON
Features Editor

"Destiny" is the latest release by pop-funk dynamo Chaka Khan who, with this album, should realize her destiny as one of the revered performers in American music.

This album, a follow-up to her mildly successful 1984 release, "I Feel For You," is successful because Chaka has added a very appealing hard rock edge to her songs without sacrificing her funky voodoo or impressive voice. Anybody who doubts Chaka can belt out a hypnotic melody needs to listen to "Destiny."

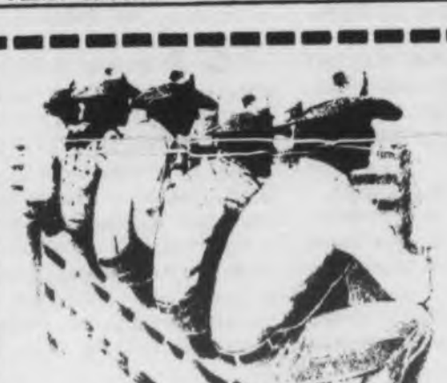
Standout songs on side one include "Love of a Lifetime," which features the band Scritti Politti and opens the album. Also, "My Destiny," in which Chaka proclaims: "I'm the ruler of my destiny / If I blow it, it's because of me."

One song, "Earth to Mickey," is a rhythmically appealing yet unnecessary song about Chaka trying to reach her boyfriend who is spaced out somewhere.

Another song on side one is "Watching the World," a song in which Chaka makes a political statement about living in peace. "There are fools who believe we can't live here as one / There are those who believe it can be done."

Oddly enough, Phil Collins assists with vocals and drums. Actually, that's not odd considering Collins has performed with nearly everyone these days. But rest assured: Collins did not turn this song into another of his clones. Chaka is clearly in control.

Side two is definitely the funkier of the two and one of the best songs of the album, "Coltrane Dreams," is disappointingly short. It is technologically and musically superior, but it appears as if it was a filler. This song should have been showcased, not treated as an afterthought.



With "Destiny," Chaka Khan has molded an album that is fun and lively. What a long way she's traveled since her days with Rufus. Maybe it is destiny.

Television fascinates the majority of American people. It's also Big Business.

In the life of Big Business television, the three major networks (NBC, CBS and ABC) are still the ones to watch. Each September the networks unveil new programs, make new stars and promote new schedules in hopes of cornering the market of those who consume the product of TV. This fall is no exception.

The new season has already begun to a certain degree. The big explosion will be within the next two to three weeks, as the series from last year return with all the new thrills, spills and intrigue possible. Several new programs premiered this summer as replacement shows and several more premiered this week.

Altogether there are 23 new shows beginning this fall. Studies have shown only 75 percent of new shows will survive past the first six to eight weeks. That means of the 23 shows the three networks have purchased — and are pinning their hopes on — only six will live to see 1987.

Five programs began this summer, two on ABC and three on NBC. ABC's "Perfect Strangers" and "The Disney Sunday Movie" have been well received so far. "Strangers'" second season-opener was this week.

NBC premiered three summer shows: "1986," "Valerie," and "You Again?"

The news program "1986," featuring Roger Mudd and Connie Chung, is the only one floundering in the ratings. Insiders predict an early success for Valerie Harper's family situation comedy and Jack Klugman's father/son odd couple.

Also starring in "Valerie" is Josh Taylor as Harper's airline pilot husband. Taylor is better known as Chris on NBC's popular daytime soap, "Days of Our Lives." Klugman's son is portrayed by John Stamos, and Elizabeth Bennett reprises her English version of the housekeeper, Enid, for American TV. "You Again?" was originally written and produced in England just as "All in the Family" and "Sanford and Son" were.

CBS has already premiered "The Wizard," a small toy genius who delights in entertaining children and rescuing people from distress. David Rappaport, Doug Barr ("Fall Guy") and Fran Ryan almost make us believe in small miracles.

Other new shows from CBS:

— "Downtown," an L.A. cop (Michael Nouri) watching four parolees, including Robert Englund ("V") and Millicent Martin.

— "Designing Women," four friends operating an interior decorating business in Atlanta. The cast includes Annie Potts ("Pretty in Pink"), Dixie Carter, Jean Smart and Delta Burke.

— "Together We Stand," with Elliott Gould, Dee Wallace Stone ("E.T." and "Cujo") and four children — three of whom are adopted.

— "Better Days," about a California basketball player transplanted to Brooklyn.

— "Kay O'Brien," the only new medical drama this season, stars Patricia Kalember as a second-year resident surgeon in the middle of a big city hospital.

CBS also returns with Stacy Keach, after his cocaine conviction in England, as "The New Mike Hammer." The program is essentially the same, but the producers have toned down Hammer's macho image and the violence somewhat.

The only prediction out for CBS's new line-up marks failure for "Downtown" and success for "Designing Women."

ABC began early premiers this week with Howard Hesseman's classroom sitcom, "Head of the Class." Hesseman portrays a substitute teacher for a high school honors program class — in other words, geniuses and geeks (their words).

A clone of the movie "Starman" stars Robert Hayes as the alien returning to Earth 14 years after his departure. Gil Gerard, formerly of "Buck Rogers in the 25th Century," stars in "Sidekicks" along with Ernie Reyes Jr., the pint-sized karate black belt; and Shelley Hack and Tom Mason are "Jack and Mike," a slower paced version of "Moonlighting" and its stars, Cybil Shepard and Bruce Willis. "Jack and Mike" will follow "Moonlighting" on Tuesday evenings for ABC. The new show is only similar to the very popular "Moonlighting" in that the characters look alike. "Jack and Mike" doesn't seem to have the chemistry or the quick one-liners its highly rated predecessor does.

Other new shows for ABC:

— "Life With Lucy," with Lucille Ball returning to network TV in her fourth "Lucy" series along with Gale Gordon.

— "The Ellen Burstyn Show," another extended family comedy including Burstyn, her mother, her daughter and her 5-year-old grandson.

— "Our World," a look at history by ABC News will be hosted by Linda Ellerbee and Ray Gandolf.

— "Sledge Hammer!" a spoof on the detective shows (especially "Mike Hammer") stars David Rasche and Anne-Marie Martin.

— "Heart of the City," a L.A. police detective (Robert Desiderio) raising his two teen-agers alone after his wife is murdered.

The only prediction is failure for "Heart of the City" and possible success for "Sledge Hammer!" For other possible successes keep a watch on both Lucy and Ellen.

NBC has premiered "Our House," a family comedy/drama starring Wilford Brimley ("Cocoon") and Deidre Hall ("Days of Our Lives"); "Easy Street," with Loni Anderson, Jack Elam and Lee Weaver; "Crime Story," Chicago cops in the 1960s; and "L.A. Law," Steven Bochco's law firm blues.

Hall portrays Marlena in NBC's daytime soap opera (another daytimer moves to night) and makes the transition to primetime with ease and elegance. Anderson was, of course, the receptionist for the wacky "WKRP in Cincinnati" and Elam and Weaver will be recognized as familar character actors.

"L.A. Law" stars Harry Hamlin, Jimmy Smits, Jill Eikenberry, Richard Dysart, Corbin Bernsen and others in an ensemble effort from the producer of "Hill Street Blues." "Crime Story" is set in the '60s and the lead, Dennis Farina, was really a police officer in Chicago during the turbulent decade. This drama is produced by Michael Mann of "Miami Vice" fame.

Look for "Our House" and "L.A. Law" to continue, while "Easy Street" and "Crime Story" disappear.

NBC's other new series:

— "Amen," with Sherman Hemsley returning as a holy terror deacon very similar to his popular George Jefferson.

— "ALF," an Alien Life Form starring in a family sitcom. The humans in this Muppet from Space comedy include Max Wright ("Touch and Go") and Anne Schedeen.

— "Matlock," with Andy Griffith's answer to Perry Mason. The series also stars Linda Purl, as Matlock's daughter (also an attorney) and Kene Holliday as the team's private investigator.

Success is predicted for "Matlock" with question marks going to "Amen" and "ALF."

The three networks are also moving quite a few of the established series to new time slots — check listings for all the changes.

Personal favorites and new programs to watch are "Our House," "Designing Women," "Matlock," "Head of the Class," "Together We Stand," and, of course, "L.A. Law."

Also worth checking the listings for are PBS offerings, movies, specials and cable. There are only seven network mini-series planned but there are a wealth of made-for-TV movies, some of which should prove to be worth the time and effort to view them.

It's a new season on network television. Only time will tell if the audience, the critics and the networks view it as a success.

Daryl Hall's 2nd solo LP merits praise

By LAURIE FAIRBURN
Entertainment Editor

Daryl Hall went to great effort making "Three Hearts in the Happy Ending Machine," a step out of the techno-pop gutter where he's been so at home.

His second album, produced with the help of Eurythmics' Dave Stewart and Tom "T-Bone" Wolk, is not, at a cursory listen, much different from the characteristic sound of Hall and Oates. It's danceable. It's best when played loud. It sounds schizophrenic on a bad stereo. It's soul-laced rock 'n' roll.

Most of all, "Three Hearts in the Happy Ending Machine" makes obvious just how much of the Hall and Oates' "sound" belongs to Hall.

Hall's vocal arrangements exploit his expressive vocal style and range. His use of backup vocals varies little from his Hall and Oates work, which is fine because it finally makes sense.

Hall and Oates has never sounded like a duo, and I always find myself wondering, "Where is that John Oates, anyway? What does he do?" Hearing Hall's pushed-to-the-limit tenor simply enhanced by Bob Geldof, Dream Academy's Kate St. John, Joni Mitchell and Stewart makes Hall's work sound fresh, and somehow more personal. The background vocals are distinct from Hall's voice, an element not present in his work with Oates.

What makes "Three Hearts in the Happy Ending Machine" worthwhile is Hall's imaginative instrumental arrangements, evident on most songs on the album.

Hall shunned hi-tech keyboards in favor of the purity of guitars, violins and mandolins. The result is an emotional melding of sounds more sensory than synthetic.

The most disarming and awe-inspiring aspect of the album is Hall's approach to percussion. With the help of Michel De La Port, Hall has given a distinctive aura to his lyrics.

Hall used tuned drums and water drums, which are hollowed-out gourds placed in a pot of water and tuned by altering the amount of water in the pot.

"De La Port brought in Indian and Middle Eastern rhythms...more undulating, rolling rhythms than the Afro American rhythms I usually use," Hall said.

The critical value of the album may have been tainted by the popularity of the album's two worst songs, "Dreamtime" and "Foolish Pride."

"Dreamtime" is a cluttered and uncomfortable track. "Foolish Pride" sounds so much like borrowed remnants of Hall and Oates' "Say It Isn't So" it provokes a smirk.

Thoroughly deserving of praise is "Right as Rain," the most mellow selection, with Joni Mitchell providing perfect backup. Hall's arranging on "What's Gonna Happen to Us" is worth the price of the album, and the song is by far the strongest track.

Daryl Hall, the man who has written more No. 1 singles (seven) and sung more top-40 singles (15) in the '80s than anyone, isn't slowing down.

Johnson quits committee job under pressure

By JUDY GOLDBERG

Student Body President Steven Johnson resigned his position as chairman of the Student Advisory Committee to the Kansas Board of Regents after being asked to step down Thursday.

Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, said student body presidents of other Kansas Regents institutions had been working against him since June.

"Basically, they've been working behind my back," Johnson said a week before the meeting.

David Epstein, student body president at the University of Kansas, was elected as the new chairman at the committee's September meeting at Fort Hays State University.

The committee, comprising student body presidents from all Kansas Regents institutions, meets with the Regents two days a month to voice students' concerns.

Johnson was elected as student body president in February and was elected as committee chairman in March.

Epstein said many committee members voted for Johnson because they were against the aggressive leadership qualities of his opponent, Jeff Kahrs, The Wichita State University student body president.

Epstein said he believed Johnson was "overwhelmed" by the chairman position.

"I had some questions about Steven's leadership as early as (June)," Epstein said. "I started talking with people about it at the retreat."

The committee went on a retreat in August to "discuss the purpose and direction of SAC," Johnson said.

Johnson said other committee members often go out at night before the second day's meetings, but he prefers a good night's sleep instead.

He said part of the reason he was asked to step down may have been because he did not socialize with the other committee members.

Epstein said the decision to ask Johnson to step down was not personal, but directional.

"I really believe this was not a personal attack against him," Epstein said in response. "I'm kind of disappointed he believes that.

"I really felt that Steven was not taking SAC in the direction that I thought it should be going," he said.

"We were becoming reactionary instead of making actions," Epstein said. "I want to pursue other issues with a more aggressive style."

Johnson said he believed committee members wanted more freedom and less control from the chairman.

"I treated everyone as an equal," he said. "I didn't try to rule it with an iron arm. I saw the position of chair-

Mud bonds volleyball team members

Here's mud in your eye. And in your hair, your face, your ear and your mouth. It's Oozeball — a mud volleyball tournament sponsored by the KSU Student Foundation.

The tournament ran all day Saturday at the KSU Foundation's TechniPark, located just off of Claflin Road on Heywood Drive. The event consisted of four mud pits this year, which allowed the 40 coed teams to play the double-elimination tourney in one day, said Oozeball chairman Steve Janda, sophomore in electrical engineering.

Staff/Greg Vogel

Jeff Vander Laan reacts after his team makes a point Saturday.

"Even though there is some great competition, there is a common bond between all the players — mud," said Oongas team member Steve Belfield, junior in electrical engineering.

The Mud Daubers defeated Charlie's Neighborhood Bar after two grueling matches for a trophy and the title of the 1986 Oozeball champions.

The final four teams — the Dish Pan Clan, the Mud Daubers, Charlie's Neighborhood Bar and the Oongas were given T-shirts sponsored by eight Manhattan merchants.

To be eligible, every team had to have at least one person on its team who was a K-State student, faculty member or employee, according to the Oozeball rules and regulations handbook.

Many teams had faculty members and employees as members.

"It's hard to look dignified when you're playing, but it's fun anyway," said Bruisin' Oozers team member Cheryl Armendariz, lab technician II for the entomology department.

Each team consisted of eight members: four men and four women. Three men and three women had to be in the pit at all times, Janda said.

Staff/Greg Vogel

Dawn Kaufman, freshman in pre-medicine, attempts to hit the ball as Jason Aldridge, senior in interior design, watches during the tournament.

"We had a lot of fun even though we lost," said Slime team member Dana Hinshaw, freshman in finance. "I must say the other team was playing pretty 'dirty', though."

The Student Foundation hosted the first tournament last spring, too.

"We knew the first year would be a learning experience, but this year we learned a little more and earned some money to go into our scholarship fund," said Glennis Carlson, director of administrative services and Student Foundation adviser.

In order for the tournament to make money for the fund, a lot of planning and preparation had to be done, Carlson said.

"It took many, many hours of preparation just for the pits alone, said Brenda Roach, pit crew chairperson and junior in arts and sciences-general. "We had the pits professionally plowed. Then the excess water was pumped out. It was

East-West delegates sign security pact

By The Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Delegates to the 35-nation East-West security conference agreed Sunday on a package of information-sharing measures designed to reduce the risk that war could break out in Europe by accident.

It is the first East-West security accord since the SALT II pact in 1979.

A formal vote on the agreement was scheduled for late Sunday but was put off until Monday so the document could be printed. It then must be ratified by the 35 governments, and is scheduled to take effect Jan. 1.

Both U.S. and Soviet delegates praised the accord as contributing to a more stable military situation in Europe and improving East-West relations in general.

Soviet chief delegate Oleg Grinevsky described it as a "new foundation for the peace process in Europe." U.S. delegation chief Robert Barry said the agreement "shows East and West can say yes to each other for a change."

However, a ranking U.S. delegate, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Soviet-required restrictions on verification through on-site inspection made the agreement inadequate.

The agreement stipulates that members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Warsaw Pact must notify the other bloc at least 42 days in advance when planning military activities involving 13,000 soldiers or more or 300 tanks or more.

Any nation conducting military maneuvers involving 17,000 soldiers or more must invite two observers from other participants in the Stockholm conference.

When maneuvers involve amphibious landings or paratroops, nations must notify the other side if just 3,000 or more are involved, and invite observers if 5,000 troops or more are taking part.

The Stockholm Conference on Security- and Confidence-Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe began in January 1984, with delegations from the United States, Canada, the Soviet Union and all European nations except Albania.

It was intended as a follow-up to

Regents' chairman 'not optimistic' improvement requests will be met

By The Associated Press

HAYS — The chairman of the Kansas Board of Regents says he is not optimistic the Legislature will grant all of the board's requests for salaries and program improvements.

"The picture painted by the budget process in this state is not very optimistic," Chairman Frank Becker said at a news conference before a regents meeting Friday. "We hope to get two-thirds to three-fourths of our request."

The board has asked the Legislature for an 8 percent increase in faculty salaries and a 1 percent increase in faculty retirement benefits for fiscal year 1988, starting July 1, 1987.

The board is also asking for a base increase of 5 percent for other operating expense portions of the budget and $12 million in program improvements for its institutions.

The board asked that student affairs offices, student government offices and presidents of the seven schools governed by the regents make semi-annual reports to the board about educational and testing programs for drugs.

The board's Student Advisory Council submitted a statement protesting the testing of students for substance abuse, calling such testing "a clear violation of students' liberties and their constitutional rights."

Representatives of the student group said they did not include university athletes in their statement because of current athletic association regulations requiring the random testing of athletes.

The board also approved issuance of bonds to provide part of the funding for the construction of the Fred Bramlage Coliseum at K-State if bids fall within the range set by the University.

Lebanese brothers maintain vigil

By The Associated Press

QOBAIYAT, Lebanon — Four Lebanese brothers wanted by France in connection with deadly bombings in Paris said Sunday they are keeping a 24-hour vigil at their north Lebanon home because they fear French agents will try to kill them.

"Of course we are afraid," said Joseph Ibrahim Abdallah, the eldest of the four. "French authorities have plenty of collaborators all over Lebanon."

Joseph, 35, and his brothers, Emille, 30, Maurice, 23, and Robert, 20, stand guard in shifts at their two-story house on the eastern edge of Qobaiyat, a town of narrow, dusty alleyways.

About a dozen neighbors have been helping keep vigil since France announced Friday that the brothers were among nine Lebanese wanted in connection with the Paris bombings. The brothers have denied involvement.

Prime Minister Rashid Karami said in a statement Sunday he would begin an investigation to clear the brothers, and accused Israel's Mossad secret service of involvement in the bombings.

The five bombings in Paris beginning Sept. 8 killed eight people and wounded 164. Responsibility has been claimed by the Committee for Solidarity with Arab and Middle Eastern Political Prisoners.

French police say they believe the Committee for Solidarity is a cover name for the Lebanese Armed Revolutionary Factions, and that the nine Lebanese they named, including the Abdallah brothers, belong to the group.

They believe the group is headed by a fifth Abdallah brother, Georges, 35, who is serving a four-year prison term in France for possessing weapons and false documents.

Peace Corps celebrates 25th year

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast — The memories stirred at a weekend Peace Corps reunion in this West African capital came from off the beaten path: eating insects, living without running water or electricity, coping with dysentery.

A U.S. Embassy reception here Sunday marked the 25th anniversary of the Peace Corps, founded by President John F. Kennedy in 1961 to help spread education and American technical expertise along the world's back roads.

Robert Walbridge, a volunteer in Ivory Coast from 1971-76, was among more than 80 former Peace Corps members, current volunteers, friends and spouses at the reunion.

"I was very idealistic and I still am," said Walbridge, assistant director of the International School in Abidjan.

The former volunteers have become lawyers, bankers, consultants, development experts and teachers. They have served in countries from India to Bolivia to the Ivory Coast. Many went on to other aid and development jobs in the Third World, and most said they would do it all again.

Since its founding, 120,000 volunteers have served in 94 countries, according to the Peace Corps. In 1985, 5,800 volunteers were serving in 64 countries.

Liver donor found for 4-year-old

LONDON, Ontario — Four-year-old Gabriel Bruce was scheduled to undergo a liver transplant Monday after hospital officials found a donor in the United States on Sunday.

The boy from Winnipeg is in critical but stable condition. The kidney is coming from Kansas City, Mo., according to officials.

John Finney, a spokesman for Children's Hospital in London, said Bruce was transferred Sunday to nearby University Hospital in preparation for the transplant.

"A potential 3-year-old donor in Kansas City has been identified, and the parents have agreed to donate the liver," Finney said late Sunday.

Finney added he was uncertain when the liver would arrive in London but doctors expected to complete the operation by noon Monday.

Gabriel Bruce's liver was seriously damaged in August by what doctors believe was a bout of hepatitis. He has been on the highest priority list for a liver donation since Aug. 27.

Television show reveals royal life

LONDON — Prince Charles and Princess Diana provided a glimpse Sunday into their world of instantly available helicopters and of 40 fulltime staff members to help run their private and their public lives.

Also on view were such insights into the royal couple as Charles' fondness for talking to his plants.

Independent Television showed the first segment of a two-part program, for which camera crews followed Charles and Diana for one year.

While the program includes plenty of material to remind viewers of the couple's super-celebrity status, it also shows another side of their lives.

Charles is shown visiting a fashion firm run by Rastafarians in riot-torn Birmingham as a local disc jockey tells listeners "the man don't just talk, the man do really care."

Gasoline prices fall, reversing trend

LOS ANGELES — Gasoline prices fell slightly in the last two weeks, reversing an August increase and reflecting the end of the summer driving season, an analyst said Sunday.

Trilby Lundberg, publisher of the Lundberg Letter, said her organization's twice-monthly survey of nearly 16,000 stations showed overall gas prices for Sept. 5-19 dropped nearly half a cent, for a combined average price of 87.85 cents a gallon.

That average includes all grades of gas at both self-service and regular pumps. Prices in August rose more than 1.5 cents, she said.

"Some markets are rising, and some are falling. There is a lot of volatility right now," Lundberg said. "But prices on a national level are soft because of the seasonal decline after the peak summer driving season, and, simply, because we have more supply than we are burning."

According to the survey, regular unleaded gasoline at self-service pumps was down three-fourths of a cent, to 80.19 cents a gallon. Regular leaded was 74.89 cents a gallon, down more than half a cent, and premium unleaded was 94.29 cents a gallon, down by nearly seven-tenths of a cent.

Prices a full-service pumps remained nearly unchanged. Regular leaded was down two-hundredths of a cent at $1.04 a gallon, while regular unleaded was down a tenth of a cent at $1.10 a gallon.

Premium unleaded, the luxury grade at self-service pumps, dropped three-tenths of a cent to $1.10 a gallon, according to the survey.

Shultz presses U.S.-Soviet summit

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George Shultz continued Sunday to press the Soviet Union to let American journalist Nicholas Daniloff leave Moscow, saying a superpower summit was "most unlikely" until the case is resolved.

Meanwhile, members of Congress supported the Reagan administration's position to hold a firm line with the Soviets until Daniloff is freed.

"I think it is most unlikely that you could have a fruitful meeting in the conditions that we have today," Shultz said on ABC's "This Week With David Brinkley," reiterating remarks he made Saturday evening after he concluded two days of talks with Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze.

"It seems to me that what we must do is get this case settled before really you have an atmosphere that you can make some progress on the things people want to talk about," Shultz said during the broadcast.

Aquino visits Boston alma mater

NEW YORK — Philippine President Corazon Aquino returned Sunday to her alma mater after visiting the suburban Boston house she shared with her husband before he returned to the Philippines and was assassinated.

Aquino was taken to the College of Mount St. Vincent, from which she graduated in 1953, and was awarded the school's highest honor, the Elizabeth Seton Medal.

She and her former classmates met for about 20 minutes, posing for a class photo and discussing children, careers and school memories, including her performances of Filipino dances on the same stage from which she spoke Sunday.

She said that when her husband, Benigno "Ninoy" Aquino was jailed in 1972 by President Ferdinand by Marcos, she recalled what she was told when one of her college classmates died during their junior year: "Thy will be done."

Manhattan area to begin receiving KU public radio signal

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

Construction of a translator network to relay the signal of KANU-FM, the University of Kansas public radio station, to Manhattan and six other Kansas communities is under way, said Howard Hill, KANU general manager.

"We hope to have all seven (stations) on the air by fall or, at the latest, by the first snowfall," Hill said.

Campus radio stations KSDB (at K-State) and KANU will not be competing for the same audience, even though both are noncommercial stations, said Lee Buller, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications at K-State and faculty adviser for the student-run campus station.

"Actually, we welcome them (KANU) to our listening area," Buller said.

Noncommercial radio is important to the community because it provides music not found on a commercial station, such as jazz, ethnic and avant-garde, Buller said. Two noncommercial stations will give more of these types of music than one station.

The first of the seven translators went into operation the end of August in Parsons. The translator went on the air with one watt of power because of interference with other signals. These translators are still in a test phase, Hill said.

Emporia and Pittsburg are the planned locations for the next translators. The other communities to receive the translators will be Junction City, Independence and Bartlesville, Okla.

The translators will be installed in Manhattan and Junction City when tower crews are available, Hill said.

The translators will cost an estimated $10,000 each and will be underwritten by a federal grant for up to $7,500 each. The $2,500 balance will have to be raised locally, Hill said.

State Rep. Ed C. Rolfs, R-Junction City, chairman of the local fund-raising project, said the local portion of the cost should be raised without much trouble.

The fund-raising committee will send letters to supporters of the arts in Geary County. The mailing list is the same one used for patrons of the Junction City Little Theater and includes businesses and families, Rolfs said.

"If the $2,500 (in local support) isn't received in Manhattan or Junction City, we'll build them (the translators) anyway," Hill said. "Once the communities start receiving the signal and we have an initial fund drive (over the air), it will more than pay off their share."

Each of the translators will be erected on an existing tower or building. The tentative site in Junction City is the tower belonging to station KJCK, Hill said.

Hill said negotiations are under way with Junction City Broadcasting Inc., parent company for KJCK, for the right to mount the translator on the company's tower. However, KJCK Chief Engineer Dave Wiese said nothing has been mentioned to the station about the subject for nearly two years.

The KANU translator in the Manhattan area will be mounted on a tower owned by KSDB, Buller said.

"Our frequency at KSDB-FM will change from 88.1 megahertz to 91.9 megahertz, to avoid cross talk (receiving two different signals at the same time) with the frequencies allotted to Channel 6 on television," Buller said.

KANU broadcasts at 91.5, but the translator will convert that to 90.5 to avoid cross talk with KSDB, Buller said.

"We are operating 'in a bowl' in Manhattan because of the surrounding hills, so we have been wanting to raise our antenna higher," he said. "We are 38 feet below average terrain with the present setup. Having KANU's translator 'piggy-back' on our tower will help with the justification for a higher tower."

Also, the Manhattan-Junction City listening area will have a full-fledged Channel 6 television station soon. The proposed site of the broadcast tower is 25 miles southwest of Junction City. The station will replace the low-power K6KZ Channel 6 currently operating in the Juncton City-Fort Riley listening area, Buller said.

Channel 6 in Manhattan is only on cable and will not be affected by the transmission from the new Channel 6.

Campus attorneys offer student advice

By JO BERGER
Collegian Reporter

When accidents that occur on campus lead to lawsuits, the University attorney's office represents K-State and its employees, said Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney.

"Our office would evaluate the claim and look at the particular facts and circumstances which would determine whether the University was at fault," Thompson said.

Thompson said the Kansas Tort Claims Act establishes the process for determining liability in the case of state employees.

"The state is responsible for any negligence of its employees when the employees are acting within the scope of their employment responsibilities and are acting without malice or fraud," she said. "Liability insurance is no longer available through the University for its employees. The Kansas Tort Claims Act is like self-insurance."

The University attorney evaluates claims and is in a position to advise students on the validity of their complaint and their legal possibilities, Thompson said.

"It would be appropriate to file an injury complaint through the office of the University attorney," she said. "If a student doesn't use reasonable care and gets hurt through no fault of the University or one of its employees, liability falls upon the student."

Thompson said the attorney's office, located in Anderson 111, also gives advice to the University on how to avoid litigation and manage liability risks.

Most students encounter some questions about their legal rights and responsibilities before graduation. The students' attorney's office was formed to help students with such legal problems, said Dianne Urban, students' attorney. Urban's office is located in the SGS office on the ground floor of the Union.

"Our office handles many different types of legal problems for students, from drafting wills, contracts (and) simple agreements to handling landlord/tenant disputes," Urban said.

Legal Services was established by the Student Governing Association to advise students of their legal rights, Urban said. Accidents often occur on campus. When they do, Legal Services may be of assistance to students, Urban said.

The students' attorney's office is funded through the activities fee students pay each semester, she said.

"I'm usually one of the first people students go to, but they need to hire an attorney to represent them if they go to court," Urban said.

Road paving project redesignates parking

By The Collegian Staff

Some student parking spaces on the east row in the Union parking lot have been temporarily designated as reserved parking spaces due to the paving of Mid-Campus Drive, said Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police Department.

Students will be fined if they park in these spaces Monday and Tuesday. The paving should be completed by Tuesday, at which time parking spaces will be given back to the students, Beckom said.

In addition to the pavement of Mid-Campus Drive, several curb cuts have been made along the street for handicap accessibility.

Beckom said that because lightning last week struck and blew a transformer in the Union parking lot, all-night lights in the lot have not been operating.

Coke sends message to Botha government

Coca-Cola Inc. announced last week it is pulling out of South Africa to protest the racist policies of apartheid. Officials also stated that its holdings are going to be sold to blacks in that country if possible.

It may be difficult to sell to blacks because of discriminatory laws against blacks running major companies and because their economic situation is too poor to purchase a company the size of Coca-Cola.

Whether this move was motivated by profits or morals is still in question. But regardless of the reasons, it sends a message to the black majority that not all of the Western world approves of the policies of the white government of P.W. Botha. There are some U.S. citizens willing to take the steps necessary for change.

While President Reagan is stalling on the issue of sanctions, Coca-Cola has taken its own measures. Maybe this action will send a message to the Reagan administration and other American companies doing business in South Africa that they should pull out, too.

It could be seen as economically beneficial for American companies to pull out now. If there is no pressure from American government and businesses for the Pretoria government to change, it won't.

If it doesn't change, a violent revolution could ensue. If that happens, the new black government won't show any mercy when they nationalize those companies seen as befriending apartheid. This could mean massive financial losses for those companies.

The African National Congress and Bishop Desmond Tutu insist sanctions are the only way to thwart a violent revolution and to open up negotiations with the Pretoria government. They say that without them there is no incentive for the government to come to terms with the problem of racial oppression.

Reagan needs to rethink his policies. The black majority will either gain power or die trying. If he wants to keep U.S. strategic interests safe, he better put his chips on the winning side. He has the power to bring an end to apartheid. We would like to know his reasons for not using it.

Alumnus' experience to benefit agriculture

The selection of Sam Brownback as the Kansas secretary of agriculture should prove to be advantageous to the state's largest industry — agriculture.

Coming from a farm background, Brownback's leadership in agriculture began before his years as an agriculture student at K-State (he graduated in 1979 with an agricultural economics degree) and continued as an agricultural law instructor at the University.

Brownback is an attorney and partner in a Manhattan law firm. His legal experience will help him deal with agriculture policy and gives him professional knowledge for working in the political arena.

At age 30, Brownback's youth will encourage younger farmers to stay in business until better economic times return.

Those who know Brownback — students, teachers, farmers and businessmen — say he has the intelligence, enthusiasm, optimism and articulation necessary to operate in his new position. As a student at K-State, he proved this when he served as student body president. As the new secretary of agriculture for the state, we stand to benefit from his qualifications.

The appointment is also a boost to the quality reputation of K-State and the College of Agriculture. The University will not just gain this prestige, however, but will suffer a loss with Brownback's appointment.

David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture, said, "We are pleased that another distinguished ag alumni has been selected for this key leadership position in Kansas agriculture...The College of Agriculture does, however, regret losing an excellent classroom teacher."

The future for agriculture in Kansas is looking brighter now that Brownback is taking over its leadership. Ag students at K-State will be able to reap the benefits of Brownback's fresh ideas and talents that will be put to use in state government.

Ag Council president Jeff Ochampaugh, senior in agricultural economics, summed up how Brownback's appointment will affect his future when he said, "Agriculture in Kansas needs something different during these troubled times, and I believe Sam Brownback can have a positive influence."

The agricultural sectors of this state can rest assured that the Kansas Board of Agriculture is in the hands of a competent K-State alumnus.

Senate must represent all students

JESS CUNNICK
Guest Columnist

As a member of Student Senate, it seems that after the publicity surrounding elections each February, we spend the rest of our terms in relative obscurity.

Although a sizeable number of students participate in student government, many more don't for various reasons. Some do not have time, some are not interested, and some are not aware of Student Governing Association.

To improve this situation, the leaders in student government made a priority this session of increasing student participation in student government. No longer are they willing to wait for students to come to SGA. They are bringing SGA to the students.

However, there exists a conflict of purpose between the goals of SGA and the constitution by which SGA operates; representation in the Senate is currently determined solely by full-time students.

Each member of Senate represents 300 full-time students in his or her college. In effect, SGA is ignoring a large number of students — part-time students. Because the current Senate is based on enrollment figures for the fall semester of 1985, 2,343 part-time students — 14 percent of all students — are excluded from representation in the governing body that was organized to represent them. This is in conflict with any intention to increase student participation in SGA.

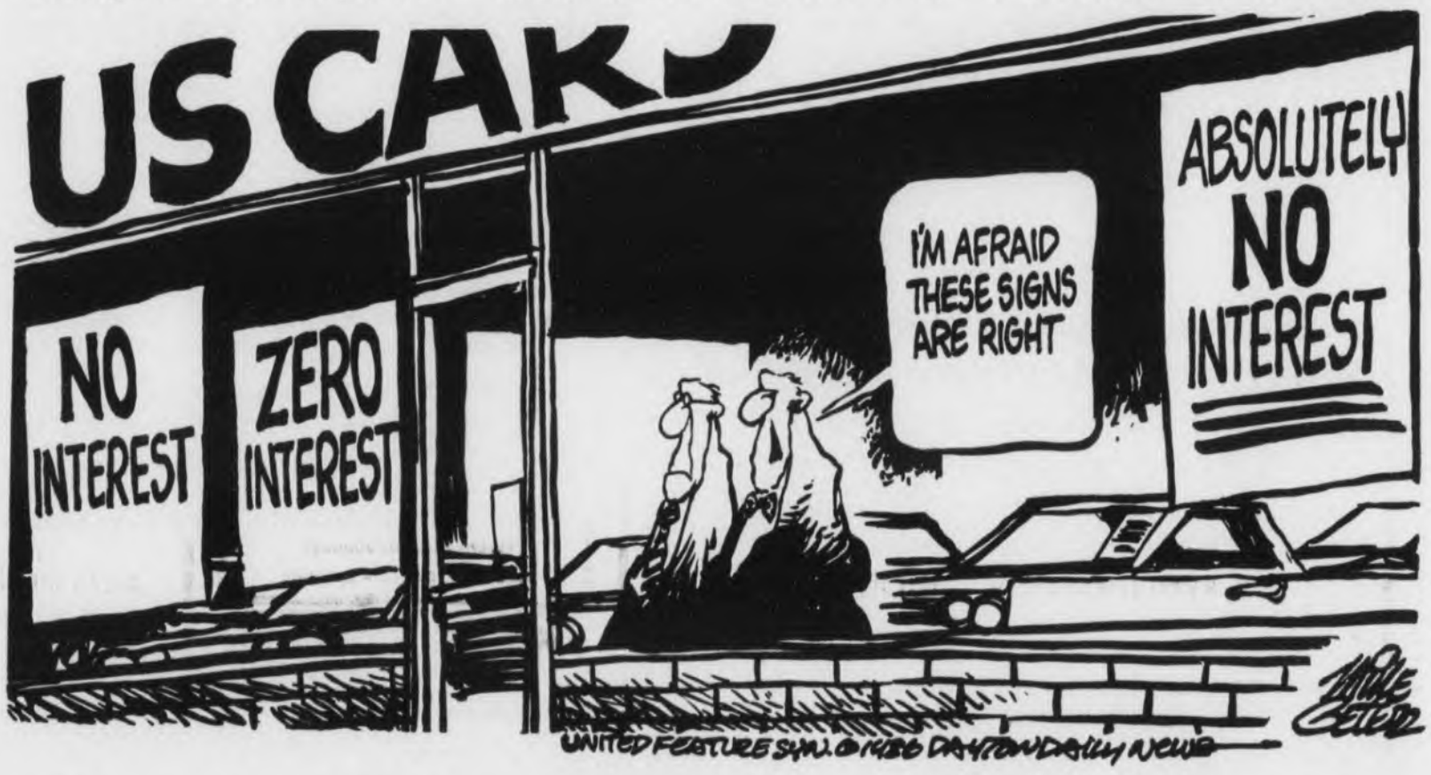
Arguments have been made against including part-time students on an equal basis or including them at all in determining the makeup of the Senate.

One argument involves the payment of special fees. Senate plays an important role in assessing and allocating the special fees we pay each semester at registration. It would seem that the student who is enrolled in one credit hour vs. the student enrolled in 15 hours would not be entitled to equal representation. But part-time students enrolled in six hours or less do pay one-half of the special fees. Students enrolled in more than six hours, but less than the number that would classify them as full-time, pay the full amount of special fees.

Payment of the full amount of special fees should entitle the part-time students to a proportionally smaller amount of representation. Is the part-time student entitled to the same privileges and rights enjoyed by full-time students?

Student Senate, which is the official representative of students at K-State, determines policies and makes recommendations that affect all students on campus whether they are enrolled in one credit hour or 15 credit hours. SGA is for students, not the other way around.

Another controversy surrounding this issue concerns the number of additional senators the Graduate School would obtain. Because there are approximately equal numbers of part-time and full-time graduates, the number of graduate senators would double. This increase, however, would be equal to or smaller than the increase in the number of undergraduate senators if part-time students were represented equally to full-time students. The issue is representation, not Student Senate composition.



What kind of message is conveyed when we appeal to students for more of their time and participation only if they are a full-time student? This is a hypocritical message, but one that we will want remedied in the near future.

SGA and Student Senate were created for each student at K-State and need each student's support and involvement. Please communicate your feelings about this issue to your college's senators. If you are a part-time student, let senators know before Thursday how you feel about your exclusion from representation.

Student Governing Services, which includes the offices for student government, is on the ground floor of the Union. All senators have boxes for messages and letters. If you cannot make it to the Union, send a letter addressed to your senators (or any senator) to these offices through the campus mail.

Additionally, you can address Student Senate directly during an open period at 7 p.m. Thursdays in the Union Big Eight Room. All senators would appreciate hearing your concerns. We are tired of working in obscurity.

'Course Source' to preview classes

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

It seems as though the University of Kansas has one up on us again — this time in the field of academics, not athletics or mummy and daddy's gross income.

According to an article in the Sept. 15 Wichita Eagle-Beacon, student senators at KU are spending big bucks — $13,000 to be exact — of student fees to publish an "expanded course syllabus." In Silo Tech talk, that translates to "line schedule/handbook of classes offered." This syllabus is designed to "help students make more informed choices about what classes to take."

The "Course Source" (that's really what they plan to call it — how preppy!) is to be crammed full of "the kind of information you usually get on the first day of class" — information such as how many and what type of papers and tests are required to fulfill class requirements (i.e. "pass"). A peek at the "Course Source" before enrollment is intended to enable a student to knowledgeably choose pud or difficult classes as he or she sees fit.

The master plan is to eventually include evaluations of professors in the "Course Source." That ought to be interesting. How many nice, printable evaluations have most students written, let alone wanted published?

Evaluations are usually that one chance to "get back" at professors for the "living hell" they've subjected students to throughout the semester. Teachers might just get off a little easier if they were evaluated on the first day of class, instead of the day before finals when their students are facing a 300-point comprehensive "do or die" final. It's not really fair to instructors. They are only doing their jobs (and most aren't getting paid enough for their time and trouble).

KU's "Course Source" could be of benefit overall, however. It should cut down drop/add lines. It may cut back on professors, too. Who wants to teach when, if you're lucky enough to have students enroll in your class, they hate you before the first day of class?

This fantastic idea of KU's could be even better with some revision. For example, how about a section for faculty use, with evaluations of all students? Professors should have a chance to drop a class when they find out who's enrolled in it and who's planning to make their lives miserable this time. In addition, more information needs to be included in the "Course Source."

Really important information such as the amount of time during which the lights will be dimmed or turned off during lectures is essential. Students should be aware of just how much this class may interfere with their naps or make falling asleep that much more difficult.

All students need to know the boy-girl ratio of a class and the seating arrangement. School should be a place to grow and learn socially, as well as academically. Of course, this "social interaction" with members of the opposite sex could be furthered in classes with dim to no lighting.

The number of films, slide shows and guest speakers per semester should be common knowledge as well. After all, hasn't it been proved that students learn more when stimulated visually? Films and slide shows make class a lot more like television. That ought to dramatically increase class attendance and make learning fun. Incidentally, I may have stumbled across the solution to K-State's declining enrollment — audiovisual presentations coupled with balanced boy-girl ratios and dark lecture rooms might be the answer.

Last, but not least, how about including information on the "relevance or lack thereof of this class to real life?" How many classes do students suffer through only to find out their new knowledge is not applicable to anything in the real world? That is, if they can remember what they learned (or "crammed") in the first place.

Parents of the '80s encourage their children to go to college so they can "make something of their lives." The literal translation of that phrase is, "Get out of the house. You're driving us nuts. And while you're out there, get some education so you can make big bucks and live yuppily ever after." Thus, shouldn't Financial Accounting 101 be replaced with "How to make a killing in the stock market?" Let's not waste time on insignificant courses. Why not go for the really important "return on your tuition investment" classes?

KU student senators really do have a great idea with this "Course Source." Students should have access to pertinent information concerning prospective classes. They're paying for the opportunity to attend the classes and should become "buyer aware." However, the idea is a bit scary, too. What if, after reading how demanding a professor's class will be, no one dares to enroll and show up for class?

U.S. methods brutal

Editor,

Re: Randal S. Beeman's letter "U.S. defends freedom" in Tuesday's Collegian.

In his criticism of Kirk Caraway, Beeman has missed the point of those who find that U.S. policy is guided by imperialist aims.

If our government is idealistically motivated to oppose the evils of Communism, why is it not equally concerned when these evils are committed by right-wing dictatorships, often to an even greater degree? If the United States is really fighting for Democracy and liberty in the third world, why has it subverted democracies or supported tyrannies in Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Greece, Zaire, Haiti, Nicaragua, the Philippines, South Africa, Indonesia, Turkey, etc.?

Let us look specifically at Vietnam. According to Beeman, our cause was "noble." U.S. intervention sought to establish "freedom" for Vietnam. If this was our motive, then why did the United States attempt to preserve the French colonial empire in Vietnam after World War II? Does Beeman think that in 1954, when we offered atomic bombs to the French to save them from defeat, we were acting from a humanitarian impulse?

If the United States' goal was to prevent the cruelty of Communism, why have we thrown in with the Pol Pot Communists in Cambodia, whose genocidal slaughter far exceeded the post-revolutionary violence of the Vietnamese?

U.S. intervention in Vietnam had one primary objective. It aimed to stop a nationalist social revolution that, by its mere example, threatened Western control over cheap labor and resources throughout the Third World. The brutality of our methods was perfectly suited to the immoral nature of our goal.

K-State prep program receives 3-year grant

By GREG BALES
Collegian Reporter

The Upward Bound program at K-State has been ranked in the top 2 percent of 400 schools nationwide to receive federal funding and is the recipient of a new three-year grant totalling $562,000.

The program, funded by the U.S. Department of Education, offers services to prepare high-school students for success in post-secondary academic fields, said Charlotte Olsen, Upward Bound director.

The money from the grant will go to pay staff salaries, student supplies and books, progam supplies, student and staff travel expenses and housing for students participating in the summer program.

"There are several students in high school that have academic potential for success in college, but normally wouldn't go for one reason or another," she said. "Upward Bound is a support group to help and provide encouragement for those students."

Paula Ellis, freshman in premed, said her experience with Upward Bound has been a "once in a lifetime experience."

"It has really helped me to grow personally, academically and socially," she said. "I'm more outgoing now."

Ellis, who participated in the Upward Bound Program for three years, said the program helped her prepare for life at the University.

"The program taught us the need for excellent note-taking skills," she said.

Standard criteria for Upward Bound's high rating include community need, quality of support from area high schools, the host school's institutional commitment to program goals, local resources available and prior success with the program.

"We're basically an academic support system," Olsen said. "The program is divided into two parts: one for the academic school year, the other for a six-week summer program."

Upward Bound hires K-State students as tutors for area high schools throughout the academic year, she said.

"We provide programs on study skills, motivation, career guidance and personal development," Olsen said. "We want to expand their (students in the program) horizons."

Other services include cultural and educational experiences some students may not ordinarily get, she said.

The second component is a six-week, residential program, where Upward Bound students live on the University campus and pursue a strong academic schedule that prepares them for returning to high school classes.

The four academic fields emphasized are math, language arts, computer literacy and study skills, Olsen said. Field trips and recreational activities also are provided.

"High-school graduates may attend a special 'Bridge Program' provided by Upward Bound," Olsen said. "It is an entirely separate program."

"The 'Bridge' students stay in the dormitories, but they stay with college summer students," Olsen said. "They attend two regular college classes.

The Educational Supportive Services staff from the office of Minority Affairs provides sessions on "Learning to Learn," personal support and tutoring, Olsen said.

For a program of this nature to work, a lot of support is required from K-State, the high schools and the students, she said.

Speaker calls for action against sexism

By ERIN EICHER
Campus Editor

Only direct action will stop sexism in K-State classrooms, said Ruth Ann Wefald, wife of the University president and guest speaker in Friday's Focus on Women.

"Someone's got to say, 'This cannot continue. This is not acceptable.' Somebody has to take action," Wefald said to about 30 faculty, staff and students in Union 213.

"Much discrimination is inadvertent. Teachers will change when attention is brought to their actions," Wefald said.

Female students who feel they are getting unequal treatment can seek support from the Women's Resource Center or the Commission on the Status of Women, she said.

The University should be proud of the "important assets" it has in the Women's Studies academic program and women in faculty and leadership roles on campus, Wefald said.

"Even though it seems like everything's on the move at K-State, it's important to be vigilant," she said.

Wefald cited a 1982 national study "The Classroom Climate: A Chilly One for Women." The study said women are less likely to be called on in class, their contributions in class are not seen as significant, and they are less likely to receive encouragement or praise for their work.

"I don't know that there's one solution to professors making sexist comments. There may be several," she said. Currently, the Commission on the Status of Women has set up a task force to recommend action to counter the "chilly classroom climate" women might encounter at K-State.

In 1979, while her husband was president of Southwest State University in Marshall, Minn., Wefald said she decided against the "satisfying and safe" occupation of teaching, instead founding Mainstay: Exploring Opportunities for Homemakers, a center for rural women.

"When you're the wife of the president of a university, you don't do that. You serve tea. You don't do much of anything," she said. "What I was doing was a risk. It was a big risk."

Mainstay was set up to provide job training, time and money management training, guidance in starting a business, private counseling and support groups, she said.

"Women who had been bank tellers for years and years were making less than gas station attendants, who were mostly males," she said.

Wefald cited statistics done in 1980 by the Hubert Humphrey Institute at the University of Minnesota which showed that women with bachelor's degrees were earning less than male high-school dropouts.

Wefald is a student in a women's studies course this semester. As of yet, she said she has no specific plans for involvement with women's programs at the University.

"We need to see the larger dream," Wefald said. "Every time we make a stand for what we know to be right, we're making a step in the movement, and that's important."

Kansas high-school students to attend University classes

By The Collegian Staff

Kansas high-school students may have the opportunity to go to classes at the University as part of the new student visitation program, said Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing.

"Basically, this is a visitation program where specifically identified students across the state are invited to visit K-State," Proite said.

She said this program would give high-school students the opportunity to sit in on classes in a field that interests them and visit with faculty about academic programs in the field.

As part of the program, Proite said 15 VIP hosts to be involved with the student-life dimensions of the program will be selected. The hosts' responsibilities will include giving tours, accompanying participants to activities and performing other duties that will vary according to the needs and interests of visitors.

"We are looking for someone who's very loyal to K-State — someone who bleeds purple," Proite said.

She said she also is looking for students who will be honest and truthful about information pertaining to the University.

Applications for host positions are being accepted this week. Proite said there are qualifications that must be met.

Hosts must be living in a University residence hall and must have past experience in and a general knowledge of the residence halls.

The new program is being coordinated by Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement.

Director says festival will stay in Winfield

By The Collegian Staff

The Walnut Valley Festival, which began in Winfield in 1975, will be back next year, said the festival director.

"The Walnut Valley Festival is going to be continued," said Bob Redford, director of the festival. "Let everyone know that next year's dates are Sept. 17-20, 1987."

The Walnut Valley Festival is a four-day weekend every September that provides performances, workshops and contests for bluegrass music fans.

At the 15th anniversary celebration of the festival, rumors circulated that 1986 was going to be the last year for the event.

Redford said this was not true. He and his wife, Kendra, started the festival 15 years ago. Although they are not going to be running it the same way as they have in the past, it will definitely be back, he said.

"For 15 years we have put our creative talent into it, and we've had a ball doing it," he said. "But we let our hearts rule our pocketbook so we've lost a lot of money over the years."

Even though the Redfords may not be running the festival as they have in the past, they still will take part in the festival that they started, he said.

For 15 years, Winfield has hosted the National Flat Picking Championships, which draws crowds of several thousand bluegrass lovers every year.

Bluegrass on the Prairie

Mike Cross lets loose with one of his offbeat songs while playing the six-string guitar Saturday night on the main stage at the Walnut Valley Festival in Winfield. Besides his offbeat songs, Cross is known for playing music ranging from bottle-neck blues, contemporary Folk and Country, Irish jigs and reels and old time mountain fiddle tunes.

A far-off train blows its whistle as it nears the town of Winfield and the sound is mixed with the humming, strummin' and twangs of bluegrass music floating through the clear night air.

As the last note fades into the distance, the crowd comes alive, cheering and clapping for more. Bluegrass fans have gathered in Winfield for the Walnut Valley Festival since 1975, when it was started by Bob and Kendra Redford of Winfield.

That year there was only one stage — now there are four stages offering more than 100 hours of concerts, 22 different workshops and eight contests with both cash and instrument prizes.

The crowd begins to move in every third Thursday in September. They come in cars, vans and campers and flood the river banks with tents, lawn chairs and coolers.

By Friday night, every available space is utilized by a group of die-hard bluegrass fans. Parachutes are laced between the trees serving as massive umbrellas from the parching sun as it beats down on the campgrounds. State flags and large signs spray-painted on sheets help the regulars find each other as they come back for their bluegrass fix.

Once inside the festival area, a laid-back crowd meanders through the maze of the four-ring circus, carefully selecting which stage to watch. As one performance ends and another begins, the crowd seeps closer together, meeting new people and filling in any extra spaces in order to be closer to center stage.

The performers, including greats like Doc Watson, Bryan Bowers, Mike Cross, John McCutcheon and Art Thieme, are as laid-back and friendly as anybody there. They mingle with the crowd after their performances, signing albums and giving tips to their fans.

Workshops are available for autoharp, guitar, banjo, fiddle, mountain dulcimer, hammer dulcimer and mandolin. Questions are asked on techniques of playing, learning, teaching and performing at each of the workshops.

The tall tales that surfaced at previous Walnut Valley Festivals are back again — bigger and better than before (as is the tendency with tall tales.) "Did you hear the one about..." and "I remember when..." preceded almost every song. And yes, there was even a workshop on "Tall Tales and Jokelore," to help others brush up on this necessary talent for bluegrass players.

Lugging lawn chairs and blankets between performances, it is hard to overlook the more than 100 booths of arts and crafts that move beyond the traditional T-shirt (which is available). There is hand-woven and dyed clothing, hand-crafted jewelry and bluegrass albums and tapes for sale at the festival, too.

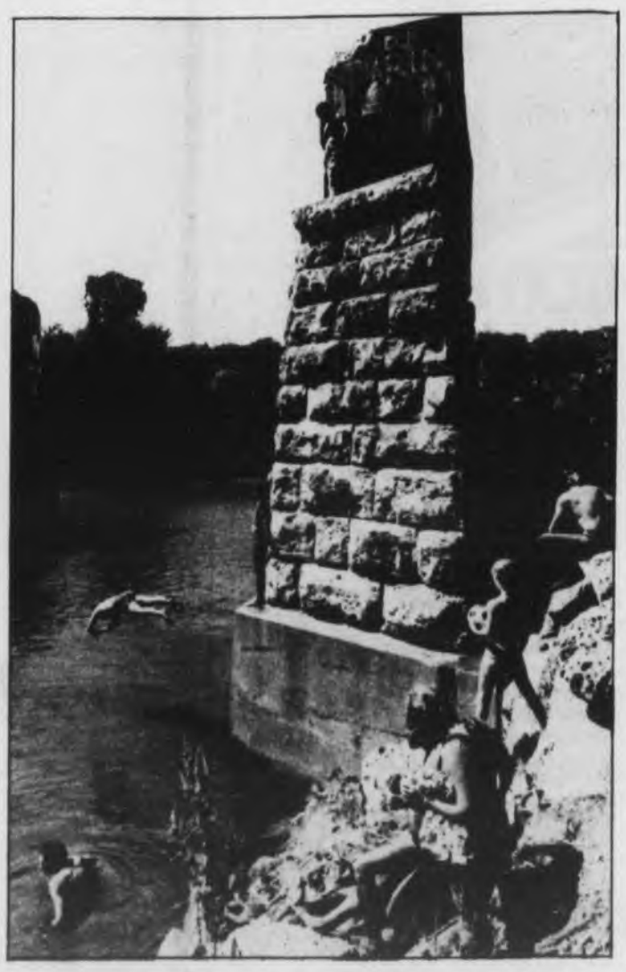
Craftsmen who make bluegrass instruments display their masterpieces and talk about the delicate, careful steps put into each one to make the quality sound expected from a bluegrass instrument.

Children are not overlooked at the festival. There is a puppet theater with special performances for kids. A horse-drawn wagon ride takes youngsters on a tour around the campgrounds, but most of the younger bluegrass fans seem to enjoy dancing to the music, eating and playing in the dusty grass.

For those who just come for the day, or campers who do not want to cook, there is food available at the festival. Everything from sloppy Joe's to smoked turkey legs on down to funnel cakes is sold.

After sitting most of the day, clogging lessons offered a chance to get up and boogie to the bluegrass. Learning was half the fun as John McCutcheon called the steps.

The last notes and cheers of the day give way to the falling darkness as the crowd moves back to the camps, not to sleep, though — the night is still young. The jam sessions spark up around the campfires as tunes and techniques are shared by the pros and the not-so-pros.



Drifting to sleep with the strums of a guitar, the music is interrupted by the "call of the wild," — an occasional rebel yell let loose by a fan who is definitely not ready for bed. Morning gives way to the early cry of the "coffee wagon," as it makes its rounds before another day full of bluegrass.

Sunday morning, the camps begin to break down as the Monday-to-workers head for home. The madhouse conglomeration of campers that formed a mini-city disappears into the dust, leaving Winfield behind — until next year.

The Hoofin' High Country Cloggers finish out the Walnut Valley Festival Sunday morning with some high steppin' for the audience.

ABOVE: Festival goers migrate among four stages from the beginning of the day until the wee hours of the morning toting portable chairs and bluegrass spirits from one stage to the next. LEFT: Weekend visitors use the remains of a railroad bridge as a diving platform.

Israel to back militia allies minister says

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Sunday that Israel would back up its Lebanese militia allies with Israeli-manned helicopter gunships and tanks to halt a surge of guerrilla attacks in south Lebanon.

He also suggested that Israel may increase the estimated 1,000 troops it keeps in south Lebanon, but declined to elaborate.

Rabin told reporters the Israeli assistance was meant "to absolutely break these attacks by inflicting large casualties" on Shiite Moslem guerrillas.

A senior military officer, demanding anonymity, said Israel would deploy troops to reinforce the South Lebanon Army militia on a case-by-case basis, but did not intend to send in a big force.

The latest rocket attack Saturday wounded three Israeli soldiers, the Israeli military command said. The attack occurred in the Israeli-occupied buffer zone of south Lebanon, which stretches six to 10 miles deep along the border and is meant to prevent guerrillas from attacking Israel itself.

Two soldiers suffered slight injuries, and the third was hospitalized with moderate stomach wounds, the command said.

The attack came one day after five French soldiers with the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon were wounded by a rocket fired at their barracks in south Lebanon.

Rabin briefed the Cabinet on the stepped-up assaults against Israeli troops, their Lebanese allies and UNIFIL in south Lebanon.

Speaking to reporters afterward, he warned that "if there will be no tranquillity on our side there will be no tranquillity on their side."

Rabin blamed Iranian-backed Hezbollah extremists and the Shiite Amal militia for attacks which killed four French peacekeepers and at least 12 militiamen of the Israeli-financed South Lebanon Army in the past six weeks.

Rabin said Israeli involvement depended on the amount of guerrilla activity. "Once it goes up, we are a little bit more involved, once it is reduced, we reduce it too," he said.

The Putnam Pirates out paddled 24 other residence hall teams to win the 46-mile KSU Canoe Race Saturday on the Kansas River.

"We got lucky," said Tom Annis, captain of the 17-member winning team and sophomore in electrical engineering. "We got the lead in the second leg, and everybody got excited. We had a blast! Now I'm exhausted."

The race began early Saturday morning at the Kansas Fish and Game boat ramp on U.S. 24 east of Manhattan.

The team representing Smith Scholarship House and Smurthwaite House was the first to cross the finish line at the St. Mary's-Maple Hill Bridge but was later disqualified.

The team crossed the finish line at 3:34 p.m. The Putnam Pirates followed at 3:58 p.m. However, the Smith-Smurthwaite team's finish was disallowed because its captain had failed to attend a mandatory captains' meeting Thursday night, said Jennifer Siebes, chairwoman for the race and junior in arts and sciences.

D.C. Eight Balls, a team representing Haymaker 8, finished second at 4:01 p.m, followed by Haymaker 3 at 4:10 p.m. The top three teams received trophies.

No limit was set on the number of people on a team as long as both sexes were represented in the canoe at all times. At nine checkpoints during the race, each team could put fresh people into its three-person canoe.

The race had been a competition between residence halls at K-State and the University of Kansas for 16 years. The event wasn't held last year, and K-State residence halls made efforts to get the race started again.

This year's race was scheduled to be a competition between K-State and KU, but some miscommunication in scheduling forced K-State teams to compete among themselves.

In the past, the race followed the river

Kidnapped girl safe after spending time in cardboard box

By The Associated Press

NAPLES, Fla. — The elaborate kidnapping and botched $1.5 million ransom demand for a 9-year-old girl, who was found in a cardboard box in a patch of woods, stemmed from a soured real estate deal, FBI agents said Sunday.

Four men, including one apprehended at his own wedding reception, were under arrest Sunday.

The ransom demand was "definitely one of the largest demands" the FBI has encountered, said FBI agent William Wells. The money was not picked up because of a failure in communications among the kidnappers, he said at a news conference here.

Amanda Mueller, a great-great-granddaughter of the founder of Mueller's Egg Noodles Co., was kidnapped Tuesday. She was found safe Saturday after spending the night and the previous day in the box.

He said that until Amanda was put in the box before dawn Friday, she was kept at an apartment, "was at times locked in a bathroom, at times bound, and at other times was possibly given a tranquilizer."

But he said she was generally treated well and spent most of the time doing her homework.

Amanda gave authorities descriptions of her abductors and traced their route.

"She was very helpful," Wells said. "She assisted us greatly by going through the scenario, helping us identify certain pieces of evidence." He said he wished other witnesses "were as bright and as alert as Amanda."

Arrested Saturday in Naples were Richard Sais, 29, of nearby Bonita Springs, Edward O'Brien, 38, of Naples.

Arrested in Jacksonville were Peter Farrell, 37, of Naples, and his brother Paul, 22, a second-class seaman stationed aboard the USS Saratoga in Jacksonville who was arrested at his own wedding reception.

Wells said the Naples apartment where Amanda was held was rented by Peter Farrell.

Wells, in charge of the FBI's Miami office, said the abduction stemmed from a failed real estate deal last spring between Peter Farrell, a real estate developer, and Amanda's father, John Mueller, who owns Mueller Co. Realtors in Naples with his wife, Barbara.

Farrell blamed Mueller when he lost "a considerable sum of money," Wells said. He declined to provide details on the transaction.

Amanda was abducted after one of the kidnappers called her school and identified himself as her father, Wells said. The caller said he was sending one of his security men to pick her up for a dental appointment.

The girl was released from school with one of the Farrell brothers — authorities would not say which one — who posed as Mueller's security guard, Wells said.

Another kidnapper disguised as a telephone repairman watched from the road to make sure the abduction was carried out, Wells said.

Within minutes, Mueller received a call at his office and was told to go to a bank building men's room, where he found a note demanding $1.5 million.

On Friday, Mueller received a call instructing him to put the money in two pieces of luggage. He was sent to several drop points along Interstate 75, and eventually told to leave the money at the Southwest Florida Regional Airport in Fort Myers.

The money was never claimed.

"We believed they (the kidnappers) had a breakdown in their communications," Wells said.

Acting on a tip from an acquaintance of Peter Farrell, Collier County sheriff's deputies searched a wooded area outside this posh resort community on southern Florida's Gulf Coast, and found Amanda in the box.

The Farrells, who were being held Sunday in Jacksonville, will have hearings before a U.S. magistrate there today.

Sais and O'Brien were being held in Naples in lieu of $750,000 corporate surety bonds set by U.S. Magistrate Samuel Smargon in Miami.

Collier County Sheriff Aubrey Rogers said he expects all four men will be charged under state law with kidnapping, which carries a maximum term of life in prison, and a federal charge of extortion, which carries a maximum term of 25 years and a $20,000 fine.

Expelled Soviets exit U.S.

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Twenty-one of 25 Soviet diplomats expelled by the United States after they were accused of being intelligence officers left the country Sunday, officials said.

The Soviets, many carrying videocassette recorders and color televisions, boarded an Aeroflot plane at John F. Kennedy International Airport. They refused to discusss the explusion.

U.S. officials, charging the Soviets were senior intelligence officers, ordered 25 members of the Soviet mission to the United Nations to leave the country by Oct. 1.

Valentin Karymov, senior counselor at the mission, said in a telephone interview Sunday that all would leave by the deadline.

Tom Middlemiss, a spokesman for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey which operates the airport, confirmed that 21 left on the 4:30 p.m. flight.

A Soviet official at the airport, who identified himself only as Alexander, said he was assisting fellow workers.

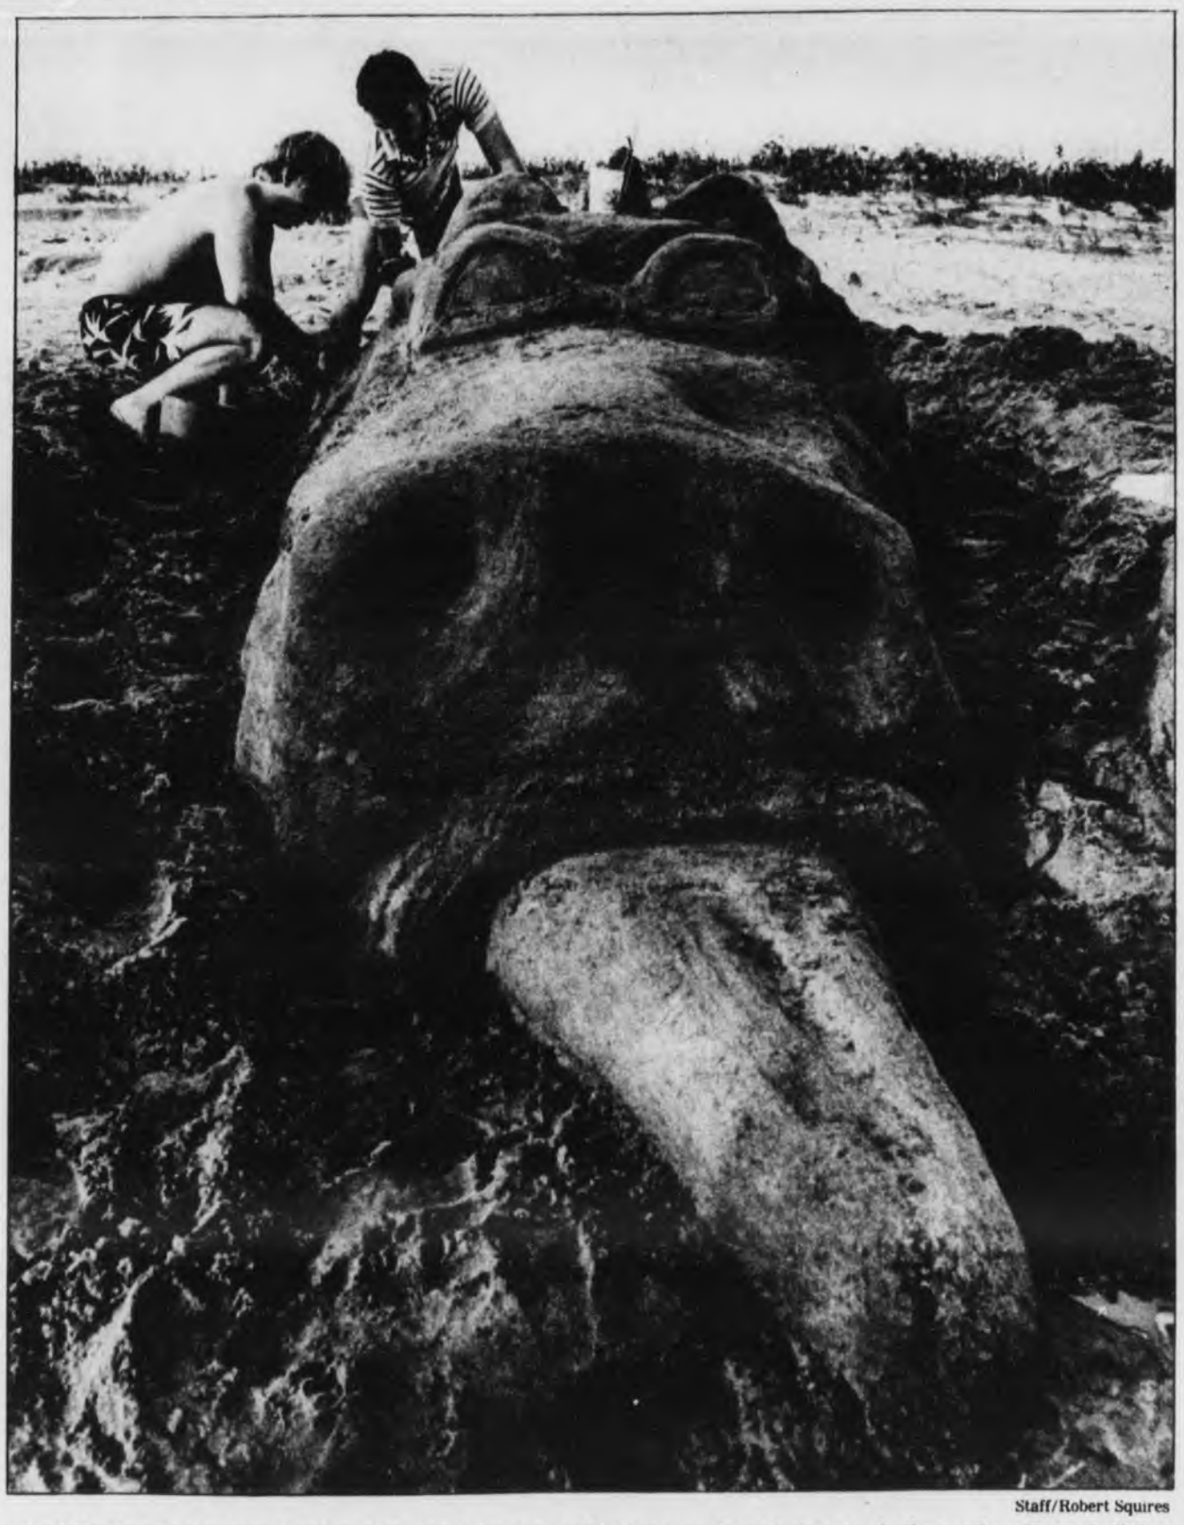
"We do not make a big fuss," he said, shaking hands with several of the departing diplomats. "You make a big fuss. ...I just told them, 'Enjoy your time...your vacation.'"

Last week, Soviet officials had said they would fight the expulsion order.

"We hoped the United States government would alter the decision," mission press secretary Anatoly Khudiakov said Sunday. "We still hope they would. But still...we are on the territory of the United States, on United States soil."

No formal protest has been lodged, Khudiakov said.

A State Department spokeswoman said Sunday she had no information about the departures.



The United States first ordered the Soviet Union to reduce the size of its U.N. contingent six months ago, saying the mission was disproportionately large and a haven for spies. The demand was repeated Wednesday.

U.S. officials maintain the order is not related to the case of Nicholas Daniloff, the American journalist arrested in Moscow and charged with espionage.

Daniloff was arrested a week after Gennadiy Zakharov, a Soviet scientist attached to the Soviet U.N. mission, was arrested in New York and charged with espionage.

Both men were later released into the custody of their diplomatic missions pending trial.

U.S. officials have called Daniloff an innocent man being held hostage in the Soviet Union. Daniloff has said he was framed by the KGB.

Chad Herd and John Blanchard, seniors in landscape architecture, work on their entry in the sand sculpture building contest Friday evening at Tuttle Beach. The two titled their winning creation the "Hip Hippo."

Crafters build sand into temporary art

By MICHELLE ENGEMANN
Collegian Reporter

About 150 K-State architecture students spent part of Friday reverting to the childhood activity of building sand castles.

The students were working to create the best castles Tuttle Creek Lake beach sand would yield in the fourth annual Sandcastle Charette.

Denise Laspulato, coordinator of the American Institute of Architecture Students' event at the Broken Arrow Ranch beach on the shore of Tuttle Creek, said the 22 official entries were competing for the "Silver Spade" token award.

For most students, the real prize was an evening of fun.

Kevin Hawkins, sophomore in predesign professions, said the judges were looking for entries that were "original, radical, crazy and good. They're looking for someone creative, not just a good technical director."

Hawkins' "Chernobyl — The Day After" did not place, but received a comment of "best use of color" from the judges for its spray-painted green and orange effects and Roman candles sticking out of the chimney.

The first-place entry was the "Hip Hippo." Its creators were Ron Fiegenschuh, senior in architecture; Ana Caguin, senior in interior architecture; Joel Jacobsen, senior in interior architecture; Dave Weitz, senior in interior architecture; Rich Gau, senior in mechanical engineering; Chad Herd, senior in landscape architecture; Jon Blanchard, senior in landscape architecture; and Tulin Artan, senior in interior architecture.

"It started out as a castle, then became a pig, a cow and then turned into a hippo. It just kind of happened," Fiegenschuh said.

"Doorway to the Sea or Tuttle" won second place. The front door — complete with doorknob, mailbox and newspaper — was built by Curtis Castle, Don Kieser and David Hess, all fifth-year architecture students.

Creators of the third-place entry, "Pigmania," were fifth-year students April Poore, architecture; Cindy Moore, interior architecture; Jeni Eusterbrock, architecture; Jim Edgar, architecture; Larry Russum, architecture; Denise Laspulato, architecture; Clark Kietel, architecture; and Debbie Starr, senior in business administration.

Bill Jahnke, assistant dean of architecture, said he was impressed with the event.

"There were lots of really outstanding ones," he said of the entries. "We had a very good turnout with representatives from every (architecture) department."

Jahnke and several other faculty members served as judges.

Coach Stan Parish argues with a referee over what he feels should be a pass interference call after an unsuccessful attempt at a two-point conversion. K-State lost to Texas Christian 35-22.

Wildcats scare TCU before falling, 35-22

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

FORT WORTH, Texas — After two weeks that couldn't have turned out much worse, K-State's football team may be on its way back.

No, the Wildcats didn't exactly set the world on fire in a 35-22 loss to Texas Christian Saturday night. But at the same time, K-State, 1-3, showed some signs of life that were not in evidence in consecutive losses to Texas Tech (41-7) and Northern Iowa (17-0).

After falling behind 28-6 early in the third quarter, the 'Cats battled back and nearly made a game of it. A disputed offensive pass interference call against wide receiver John Williams on the TCU 1-yard line eliminated K-State from contention in the final period.

"I'm not satisfied because we didn't win, but we did a lot of things a lot better tonight," K-State Coach Stan Parrish said. "From where we were last Saturday night, I don't think anybody gave us much of a shot at doing much here tonight."

In spite of the 13-point margin of defeat, K-State did give the estimated 2,000 to 2,500 Wildcat fans among the 26,139 spectators at Amon G. Carter Stadium an indication that some hope remains for the upcoming Big Eight Conference season.

K-State's offense racked up 347 yards, including 115 yards on 20 carries by running back Tony Jordan and 11 of 21 passing for 142 yards by quarterback Randy Williams.

"I feel much more satisfied. The offense really came together tonight," Williams said. "We did a good job as a team. The offensive line did some protecting tonight."

Defensively, the 'Cats barely allowed the curtain to rise on the "Tony Jeffery Show" that was expected to take center stage for the Horned Frogs. Jeffery gained just 54 yards on 17 carries.

But K-State found out there was more to the TCU veer offense than Jeffery, who set a Southwest Conference record by running for 343 yards the previous week against Tulane.

Horned Frog quarterback David Rascoe rushed for 136 yards on 20 carries and passed for 136 more. Roscoe completed his first nine passes in the first half to establish a TCU record.

"We went after Tony Jeffery and shut him down pretty well, but it was Rascoe who hurt us," Parrish said.

Rascoe filled in for injured starter Scott Ankrom, who sustained a pulled thigh muscle in the Tulane game.

The Horned Frogs other halfback, Bobby Davis, did plenty of damage as well. Davis ran for 110 yards on just seven carries, including a 72-yard run early in the third quarter.

After a first half where TCU scored on three of four drives, K-State's defense held the Horned Frogs in check for most of the second half. After Rascoe passed for 120 yards in the first half, he was held to 16 in the second half. Defensive back Robert Easterwood was the defensive leader for the 'Cats with 12 tackles.

"We came out trying to throw some control passes where we complete a high percentage and we hit a lot early on," Rascoe said. "In the

Jordan steals spotlight from Frogs' star back

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

FORT WORTH, Texas — It wasn't K-State's Tony Jordan who was expected to be the star running back Saturday night when the Wildcats played Texas Christian.

Someone forgot to tell Jordan the game's star back was supposed to be TCU's Tony Jeffery.

In the Horned Frogs' season opener last week, Jeffery cut through a soft Tulane defense for 343 yards on 16 carries. Most thought the K-State defense would have done a fine job if they could stop Jeffery from halving his previous week's totals.

But the Wildcat defense did better than a fine job in containing Jeffery. The explosive runner finished the night with 54 yards on 17 carries in the 'Cats' 35-22 loss to TCU.

Few, though, have ever said Jordan lacks the skills to be a first-class running back.

And after two seasons and three games of people saying "he has all the tools to be a good one," it took a trip here for the K-State junior to prove his supporters right.

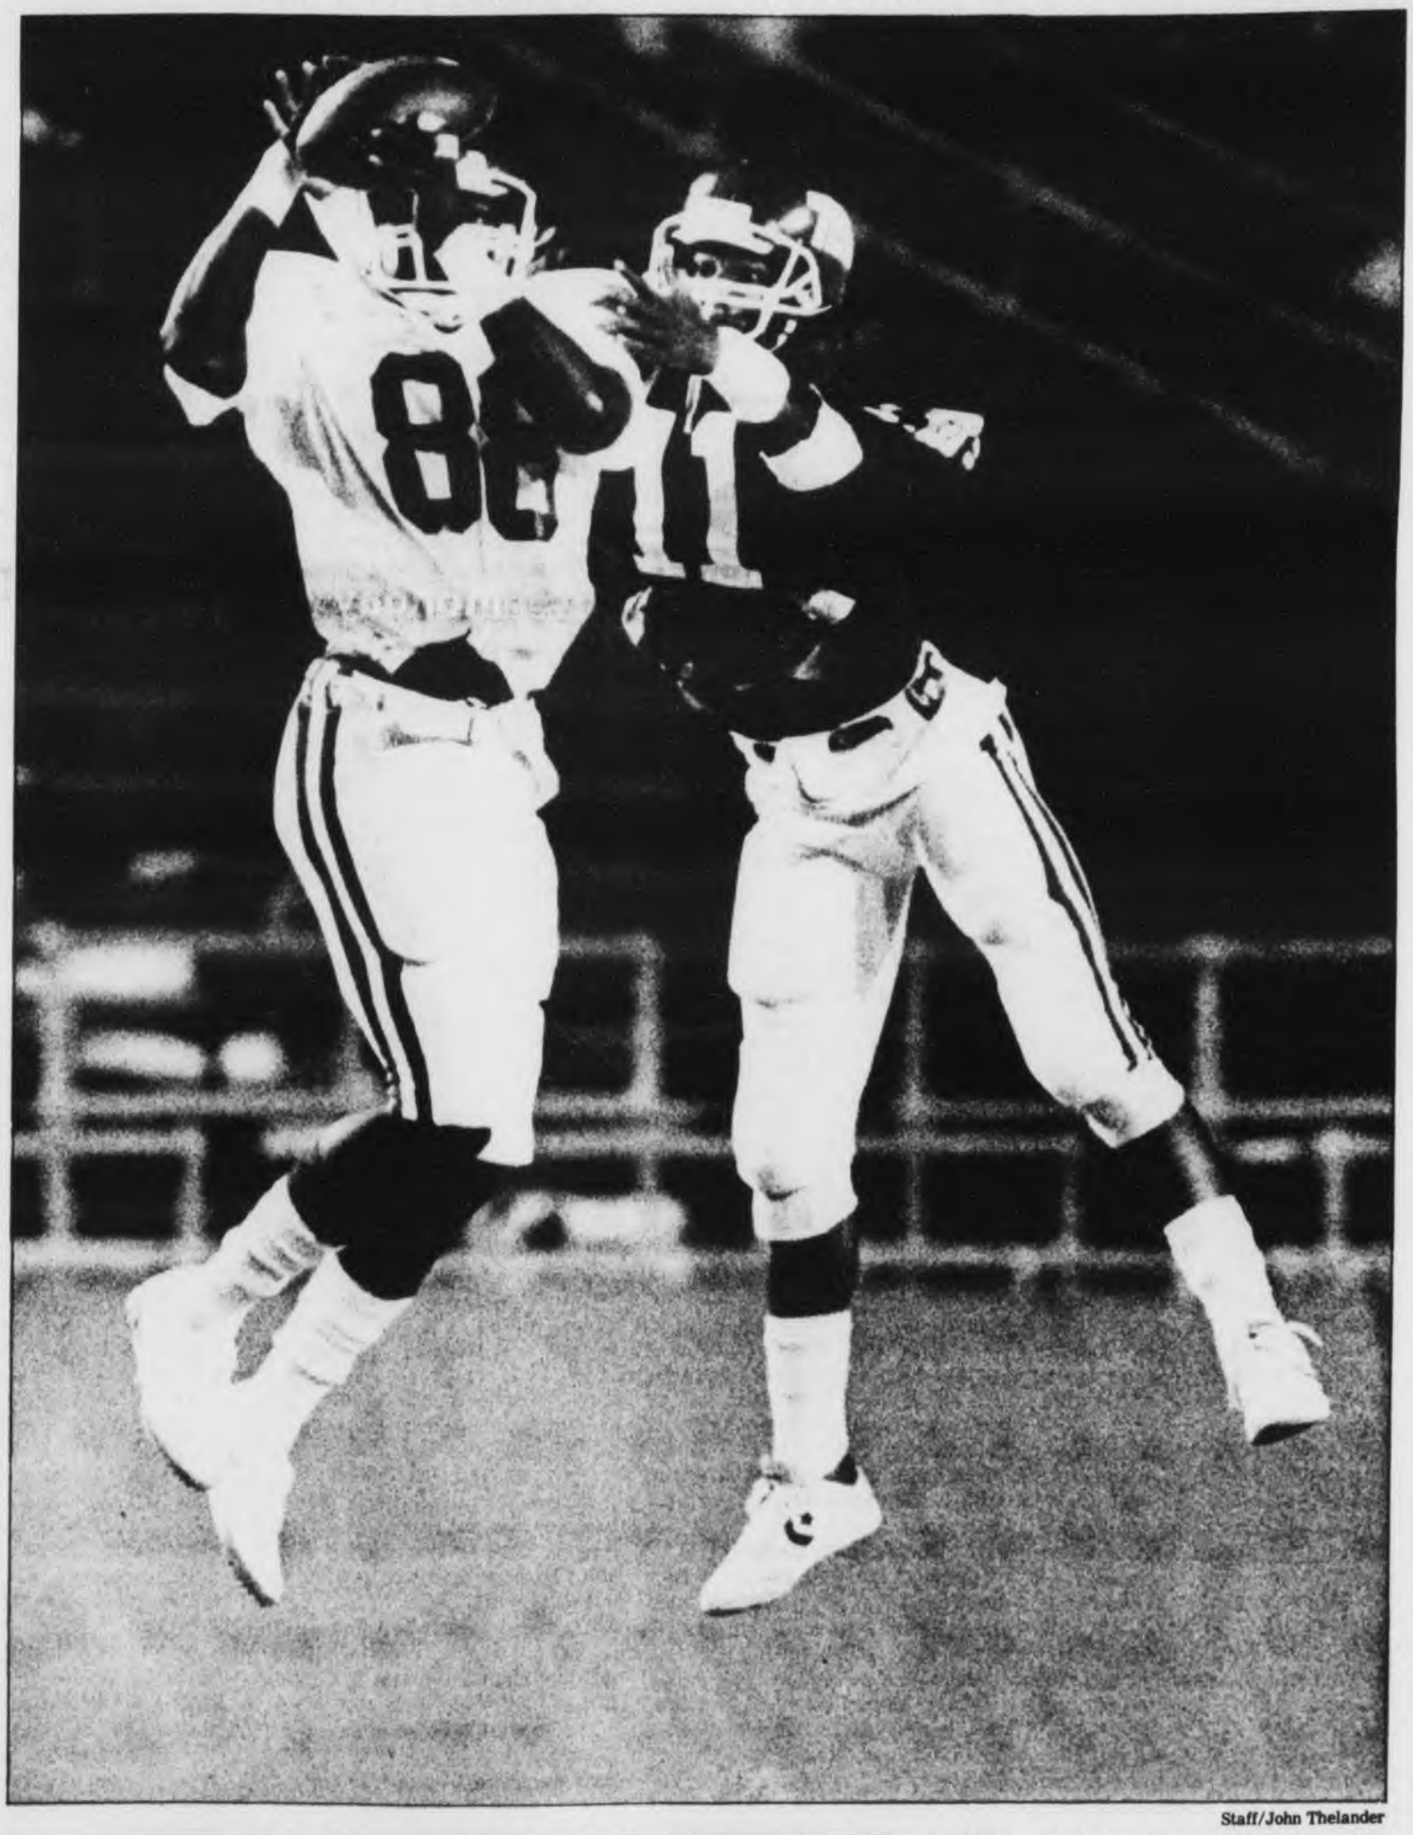
Jordan came into the Wildcat game against Texas Christian in the second quarter. After gaining only 17 yards on six carries in the first half, the Rochester, N.Y. native cut loose in the second half to complete the evening with 115 yards on 20 carries.

"Tony Jordan did some running tonight," Wildcat Coach Stan Parrish said following the game. "Everybody did a great job."

On a third down with 6 minutes, 58 seconds left in the game and the 'Cats in need of eight yards for the first down, a draw play to Jordan caught the Horned Frog defense off guard.

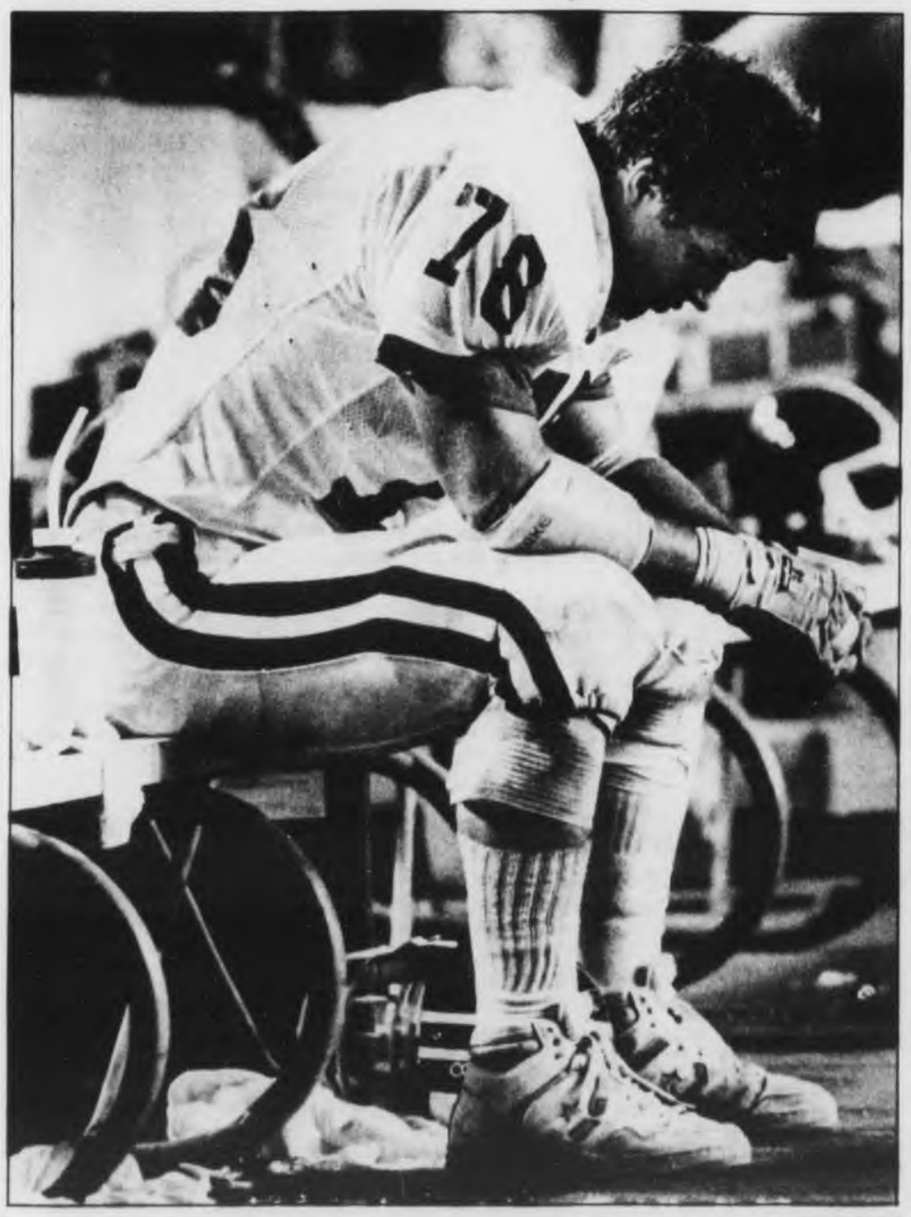
Jordan flashed into the Horned Frog defensive backfield and wasn't dragged down until he had scampered 57 yards to the TCU 21-yard line. That one dash accounted for more yards than Jordan gained throughout last year's 1-10 season.

Parrish refused to hang his head following the game. Despite his Wildcats now being 1-3 on his inaugural season, he saw more positive things in the loss to TCU than he had viewed through the first three games.



One of the most pleasant sights for Parrish was Jordan and the blocking he received from a K-State offensive line that was less than spectacular in the 'Cats' last two games.

"Everybody was working real hard. We didn't give up," Jordan said. "The line got good movement on the ball and I just did my job. The line really blocked well. I just ran behind the blocks."



Jordan also credited the much-advertised "Air Parrish" offensive schemes for freeing him up to run the ball.

"It seemed that TCU was looking for the pass all night and I think we were able to run because of that," Jordan said. "They are a big, strong, physical team, and there are going to be some bruises tomorrow."

Quarterback Randy Williams rebounded from a frustrating game against Northern Iowa and credited his 142 yards passing in part to the Wildcats' revived offensive line and the running of Jordan.

Chiefs sack Moon, Oilers in 27-13 win

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two years after Houston cut him adrift, Greg Hill knows the sweet taste of revenge.

Hill romped 26 yards for a touchdown after intercepting a wobbly Warren Moon pass that helped the Kansas City Chiefs nail down a 27-13 victory over the Oilers Sunday.

"Once I had the ball in my hands I knew I was going to score because it was clear sailing," said Hill, part of a defensive charge that harried Moon all day.

"This was a sweet, sweet victory. It was vengeance for me. There's not a team I'd rather beat."

After seizing a 27-0 lead, the Chiefs' defense, led by linemen Bill Maas and Art Still, spent the day charging in on Moon, who threw two interceptions and was only 18-for-40 for 229 yards.

"They didn't show us anything we hadn't seen before," said Houston tackle Bruce Matthews. "The only problem was their personnel. You can't very well grind the ball out when you need four touchdowns. We had some pretty good pass rushers to block. Still and Mass."

"You saw the game. You know what happened," Mass said. "When a team is forced to pass and the defense knows it's forced to pass, then you're going to see some sacks. If they had gone ahead early in the game, we might not have had a sack all day."

Moon, who had not been sacked in Houston's two previous games, was sacked seven times by the swarming Chiefs' defense.

The Chiefs, 2-1, dominated from the outset, as they built a 13-0 halftime lead on Todd Blackledge's 29-yard touchdown pass to Carlos Carson and two Nick Lowery field goals.

After Herman Heard's 11-yard touchdown run following a Houston turnover, the Chiefs led 20-0 in the third. Hill stepped in front of Allen Pinkett to steal Moon's poorly thrown pass less than a minute later and romped 26 yards to put Kansas City on top 27-0.

Houston scored with 2:33 left in the third quarter when Jeff Donaldson picked up Blackledge's fumble at the 1-yard line and fell into the end zone.

A 31-yard punt by Lewis Colbert a few minutes later gave the Oilers the ball on the Chiefs' 46, and Moon hit Ernest Givins for a 34-yard gain. Banks ran 17 yards to the 1 which set up Moon's scoring plunge. Pete Koch blocked the extra point.

The Oilers, 1-2, drove to a first-and-goal from the 10-yard line with about 3:25 left, but a sixth sack of the frustrated Houston quarterback resulted in a third-and-21 situation and the Oilers failed to convert.

The Chiefs pounded 56 yards in seven plays on their first possession to set up Lowery's 47-yard field goal.

Moon, sacked by Art Still, fumbled in the final seconds of the second quarter and Bill Maas recovered at the Kansas City 44. A 29-yard pass to Carson was followed by Lowery's 45-yard field goal as time expired in the half.

The Chiefs were backed up near their own goalline when Donaldson made the play that turned the momentum in Houston's favor.

Explosive 4th inning guides KC to victory

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Jim Sundberg, Willie Wilson and Kevin Seitzer hit two-run homers, supporting nine-hit pitching by Charlie Leibrandt and leading the Kansas City Royals to an 8-1 victory over the Seattle Mariners Sunday.

Leibrandt, 12-11, walked one batter and struck out six in his eighth complete game of the season. It was his first win since Aug. 22, after a loss and three no-decisions.

The Royals scored six runs in the fourth inning. Bo Jackson followed two walks with a one-out double off Mike Morgan, 11-16.

Sundberg followed with his 11th home run of the season.

Seattle scored its only run when John Moses hit his second homer of the year in the third inning.

Half-strength squad captures KU crown

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

The picture became a little more clear for John Capriotti this weekend on the quality of the Wildcat cross country teams.

Capriotti, K-State track and cross country coach, again took a depleted squad to Lawrence for the Jayhawk Invitational on Saturday. The Wildcat squads left several runners at home with injuries when they traveled to the season-opening meet at Missouri.

K-State's women runners finished first, second, fourth, 10th, 11th and 16th to outdistance runner-up Kansas by 52 points.

Leading the Wildcats' charge was Swedish freshman Anneli Edling, who ran in her first meet. Edling posted a time of 17 minutes, 48 seconds to outduel teammate Nancy Hoffman for the gold.

"Anneli ran very easy and had total control even though she has been sick all week," Capriotti said.

Betsy Silzer, an All-American in 1984 who was sidelined last year with injuries and was redshirted, ran her first race in more than two years and captured fourth place.

The men's team, consisting solely of middle-distance track specialists, didn't field enough runners to record a score. Rodney Murrow made the trip but was scratched before the opening gun because of a sore hip. Then Brian Zwalan passed out with only one mile remaining in the race because of the intense heat, Capriotti said.

"Our half-milers ran well," said Capriotti, who still expected the men to compete for top honors even though they were competing in a relatively new event. "Very hot and humid conditions plagued the meet."

The elements didn't seem to bother the Wildcat women as they dominated the meet and put the word out that they will be contenders for a national title this season.

The teams will now prepare for the KSU Open Saturday at Manhattan's Warner Park. Capriotti said he will be "pulling out all the arsenal for the home folks." This is one of the four "target" meets he plans to run his top runners in.

The KSU Open will feature Arkansas' men's team, who Capriotti labels "head and shoulders above the rest of the NCAA."

Tampa Bay earns season's first victory

By The Associated Press

Nathan Wonsley was considered too small for the NFL when the league was conducting its college draft. On Sunday, he proved to be the big man in Tampa Bay's attack as the Bucs won their first game of the season, defeating the Detroit Lions 24-20.

Wonsley has two brothers in the NFL — George with the Indianapolis Colts and Otis with the Washington Redskins. All three are running backs.

When James Wilder, the Bucs' regular running back, was unable to play because of a bruised chest, Wonsley was ready. He rushed 18 times for 138 yards, including touchdown runs of 22 and 55 yards, against the Lions.

The victory was the Bucs' first on the road since beating Minnesota on Nov. 6, 1983, snapping a 19-game streak.

In other National Football League games Sunday, it was Atlanta 37, Dallas 35; Denver 33, Philadelphia 7; the Los Angeles Rams 24, Indianapolis 7; the New York Jets 51, Miami 45 in overtime; Minnesota 31, Pittsburgh 7; Buffalo 17, St. Louis 10; Seattle 38, New England 31; San Francisco 26, New Orleans 17; the New York Giants 14, the Los Angeles Raiders 9; and Washington 30, San Diego 27.

Falcons 37, Cowboys 35

At Irving, Texas, Atlanta quarterback Dave Archer drove the Atlanta Falcons 79 yards to the Dallas 1-yard line where Mick Luckhurst kicked an 18-yard field goal with 20 seconds left for a victory over the Cowboys.

By beating Dallas for the first time in 10 years, the Falcons increased their record to 3-0 for the season, while the Cowboys dropped to 2-1.

Dallas quarterback Danny White threw four touchdown passes, including a 22-yarder to rookie Mike Sherrard with 9:05 to go for a 35-27 lead. But Atlanta's Gerald Riggs scored on a 2-yard run with 3:28 remaining to bring the Falcons to within a point and set up Archer's game-winning drive.

Giants 14, Raiders 9

Quarterback Phil Simms threw a pair of touchdown passes to wide receiver Lionel Manuel and the New York defense did the rest as the Giants downed the winless Los Angeles Raiders.

The victory was the second in a row for the Giants after a season-opening loss to Dallas. New York has given up a total of only 16 points in its two wins.

The Raiders, 0-3 and off to their worst start in 22 years, got field goals of 22 and 35 yards from Chris Bahr on their first two possessions and a 33-yarder by Bahr with 5:44 left in the game. Los Angeles was held without a touchdown for the second consecutive game.

Broncos 33, Eagles 7

Running backs Sammy Winder and Gerald Willhite combined for 195 yards rushing to lead Denver, 3-0, over the winless Eagles in Philadelphia.

Winder gained 104 yards on 20 carries, scored two touchdowns and set up a field goal, while Willhite rushed for 91 yards.

The Broncos so dominated Coach Buddy Ryan's Eagles that he sent in backup quarterback Gary Kubiak with 9:03 left in the third period for some game experience.

Rams 24, Colts 7

A fumble recovery and pass interception set up first-half touchdowns by Ron Brown and Eric Dickerson, respectively, as the Los Angeles Rams, 3-0, downed the winless Colts in Indianapolis.

Quarterback Steve Bartkowski passed for 160 yards, including a 10-yard scoring pass to Brown, while Dickerson, who started the day ranked second in the league in rushing yardage, gained 121 on 25 carries.

Jets 51, Dolphins 45, OT

At East Rutherford, N.J., Wesley Walker caught a 21-yard touchdown pass on the last play of regulation to tie the game, then grabbed his fourth scoring pass of the game from Ken O'Brien, a 43-yarder, 2:35 into overtime to give the New York Jets, 2-1, a victory over Miami, 1-2.

Walker's outstanding performance helped offset six touchdown passes by Dan Marino, who moved atop the all-time NFL passing ratings.

The two teams combined for a record 884 net passing yards, surpassing the old mark of 883 yards set by San Diego and Cincinnati in 1982.

Vikings 31, Steelers 7

Minnesota quarterback Tommy Kramer found rookie wideout Hassan Jones six times for 140 yards and two touchdowns to lift the Vikings over Pittsburgh.

Kramer completed 19 of 27 passes for 257 yards and three touchdowns as the Vikings improved their record to 2-1.

The Steelers, who have scored only 17 points this season, fell to 0-3 — their worst start since 1970.

Bills 17, Cardinals 10

Buffalo won its first game of the season and only the Bills' fifth in their last 37 outings as they defeated St. Louis behind the passing of Jim Kelly and the running of Greg Bell.

St. Louis, 0-3, managed only a 27-yard field goal by rookie John Lee and a 19-yard scoring pass from quarterback Neil Lomax to rookie Vai Sikahema with 58 seconds left in the game.

Seahawks 38, Patriots 31

Butler, who had teamed up with Krieg for a 54-yard touchdown pass in the third quarter, beat cornerback Ronnie Lippett down the right sideline for the decisive points.

That play ruined an outstanding passing day for the Patriots. Quarterback Tony Eason threw for 422 yards, including three long touchdown passes to Stanley Morgan.

Seattle is now 3-0, while New England, which hadn't given up a touchdown before Sunday, fell to 2-1.

49ers 26, Saints 17

Jeff Kemp completed 29 of 44 passes for 332 yards and a touchdown, leading San Francisco over New Orleans.

Ray Wersching added four field goals as the 49ers, 2-1, survived a halfback-option TD pass and a 101-yard kickoff return by the Saints' Mel Gray.

Redskins 30, Chargers 27

K-State's only single-game victory came Saturday in the third-place match against 20th-ranked Texas Tech where the 'Cats won 15-13 but went on to lose 19-17, 15-8 and 15-6.

The volleyball team will next see action against Oral Roberts at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday in Ahearn Field House.

Rugby team shuts out foe

Bill Knopic led the K-State Rugby Club to a 13-0 victory Saturday over visiting Southwest Missouri State.

Knopic scored on a 40-meter try run and a three-point penalty kick from the same distance. Steve Duncan also scored a try for the Wildcats, coached by Dave Mullin.

The 'Cats led 6-0 at halftime after Duncan scored and Knopic followed with a two-point kick.

Knopic then starred in the second half by scoring with his run and penalty kick. Drama unfolded as the kick, with a strong wind behind it, hit the crossbar and barely bounced over for the score.

The rugby club will head east next Saturday to play in the Kaw Valley Cup tournament at McDonald Park in Topeka.

OU's blowout tops college action

It isn't often that an opponent finds a No. 1 team as nice as Oklahoma.

"Oklahoma played 80 players. I'm satisfied they didn't try to run up the score," said Minnesota Coach John Gutekunst, who watched his Minnesota team get clubbed 63-0 by the No. 1 ranked Sooners Saturday.

Fullback Lydell Carr ran for two first-quarter touchdowns and quarterback Jamelle Holieway ran for another two before the end of the first half, leading Oklahoma into next week's encounter with No. 2 Miami.

In other games involving nationally ranked teams, No. 3 Michigan bounced Oregon State 31-12, No. 4 Alabama beat No. 13 Florida 21-7, No. 5 Penn State got past Boston College 26-14, No. 6 Nebraska ripped Illinois 59-14; No. 7 Washington beat No. 11 Brigham Young, 52-21; Miami, Ohio, upset No. 8 Louisiana State 21-12; Southern California edged No. 9 Baylor 17-14, and No. 10, Auburn blanked East Carolina 45-0.

Pavin wins Milwaukee Open title

MILWAUKEE — Corey Pavin sank a 10-foot birdie putt on the fourth playoff hole Sunday to defeat Canadian Dave Barr and take home the $72,000 first-place money in the $400,000 Greater Milwaukee Open.

Pavin, a third-year pro from Los Angeles, needed only to two-putt on the par-4, 390-yard No. 4 hole for the victory after Barr missed the green with his approach shot. He bogeyed the hole.

Pavin's final round of 5-under-par 67 enabled him to tie Barr, who shot 70 in the final round.

It was the fourth PGA Tour victory for the 26-year-old Pavin and his first in a playoff. Earlier this year, he won the Hawaiian Open.

Pavin and Barr each parred the first three playoff holes.

Barr, 34, from British Columbia, had a chance to win in regulation on the 18th but missed a makeable birdie putt, forcing the third playoff in GMO history.

Barr's only Tour victory came in 1981, when he won the Quad Cities Open in a playoff.

second half, I think we just let up some and we can't do that.

"They (K-State) were compensating, too. They were bringing the free safety (Easterwood) in. We should have hit some deep passes to hold him in there some, but we didn't. I made some stupid throws and gave them good field position."

Two K-State turnovers in the third quarter — a fumbled punt by Mark Wentzel and a fumbled pass reception by Ray Wilson — cost the Wildcats dearly. K-State would have had the wind at its back to begin a drive at the Wildcat 40 if Wentzel's fair catch had been successful. Wilson's fumble occurred at the Horned Frog 32.

TCU had little trouble moving the ball against K-State in the first half, mounting three long touchdown drives. While Jeffery might not have piled up the big statistics, he did account for the most exciting play of the first half taking a shovel pass from Rascoe and racing 30 yards for the easy score.

K-State's Mark Porter connected on each of three field goal attempts, hitting from 28, 48 and 40 yards. The three field goals tied a K-State single-game record.

The Wildcats' two touchdowns were scored by Williams on an 8-yard draw play and Jordan on a 3-yard dive.

Two K-State players, wide receiver Todd Cowings and defensive back Brad Lambert sustained knee injuries in the game. Cowings underwent surgery Sunday for a ruptured tendon in his left knee and will be out for the season. Lambert was preliminarily diagnosed as having a torn ligament in his right knee. He will have arthroscopic surgery today before a complete diagnosis is made.

K-State has next Saturday off before meeting the top-ranked Oklahoma Sooners at Norman Oct. 4. Oklahoma was a 63-0 winner over Minnesota Saturday. The Sooners are led by all-America linebacker Brian Bosworth and last year's Big Eight newcomer of the year, sophomore quarterback Jamielle Holieway.

KSU Police reach out to children through KC football player cards

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The KSU Police Department has teamed up with the National Football League's Kansas City Chiefs in an effort to encourage children to not be afraid of police officers.

At K-State home football games, campus police officers have been giving children Kansas City Chiefs Crime Prevention Cards.

On the front of the card is a picture of a football player or a person that is involved with the Chiefs organization. A football-tip cartoon with a corresponding crime prevention-tip illustration is printed on the back.

"Our prime objective is to get kids to speak to an officer," said Richard Herrman, investigator for the campus police. The program is designed to encourage positive youth-police interaction and to promote crime prevention.

University police have been involved in the card program since 1980, Herrman said.

Campus police receive 25,000 cards each year before the football season starts, Herrman said. There are 10 cards in a complete set. Each year, 10 new cards are distributed, making each set a collector's item, he said.

"We separate the cards into sets of two before each game, and a different set of two is handed out at each of the first five home football games," Herrman said. "It has become pretty well-known that we (the campus police) have the cards. So usually all of the cards are given out during the first half of the games."

The police officers will carry any leftover cards with them in the patrol cars. At the end of the year, the officers make complete sets of 10 from the remaining cards because children will often ask for a set, he said.

"I feel the program does work. Hopefully, in the future if a child needs assistance, he will not be hesitant to approach an officer," Herrman said.

"I really enjoy talking with the kids at the football games," he said. "Sometimes I will instigate the contact with the shy kids and ask them if they have gotten their Chief cards yet."

Fourteen campus police officers were at the K-State-Northern Iowa game on Sept. 13 and all had crime prevention cards, Herrman said.

"I usually carry 50 to 100 pairs per game, and I did not have any left by halftime of the K-State-Northern Iowa game," he said.

The crime prevention cards are free to police departments who agree to give the cards away.

Friendship tutoring program remains strong after 22 years

By ROBIN HARNDEN
Collegian Reporter

The Friendship Tutoring Program is celebrating its 22nd anniversary of helping students with schoolwork.

More than 100 students from local schools will get help with difficult subjects this semester, said Frank Pritz, executive director of the tutoring program and graduate in family life and human development.

The program aims to help students feel good about themselves so they can learn more effectively, Pritz said.

"The goal of the program is that the student benefits from the relationship with the tutor, as well as from the tutoring itself," he said. "Friendship tutoring tries to provide a fun atmosphere for learning."

The program, which was established in 1964, caters to Manhattan students in grades one through 12. No specific courses are taught. The subjects each student needs help with are matched with those that each tutor feels qualified to teach.

The majority of tutors are University students. Others are volunteers from the community. The program is sponsored jointly by the Department of Human Development and Family Studies and the city of Manhattan.

Most tutors are College of Education majors seeking teaching experience. Some classes, like Educational Psychology I, encourage or require a semester of participation in the program, said Marjorie Stith, the program's faculty adviser and professor of human development and family studies.

Each tutor is assigned one student for the entire semester. The pairs meet for two-hour sessions on Thursday evenings.

Tutors expect a one-to-one relationship with a student. Occasionally, a few students are turned away because there are not enough tutors. But this rarely happens, Stith said.

There are four assigned locations for the sessions. Each building houses students of about the same age. The sessions are conducted according to the personality of the age group, said Carl Perico, junior in elementary education.

Perico is entering his second year with the program. He became involved with friendship tutoring through a class. Perico tutored one semester and will begin his third semester this fall as a site coordinator.

"Tutors can gain practical experience from the program," Perico said. "And the kids think it's great that college students are willing to donate their time and friendship.

"That's what we try to emphasize. We want the friendship part of the tutoring program to provide a real learning experience for the kids."

The number of participants fluctuates from year to year, Perico said. Sometimes there is an abundance of tutors. But when there is not, the real problem rests on the shoulders of the site coordinators.

"When you are a tutor, all you worry about is one child — your student," he said. "As a site coordinator, you're responsible for 50 to 80 people. You have to be sure the tutors are working with the kids, and when there are not enough tutors, it can create a major problem."

The program started on a volunteer basis, Stith said.

"The whole program originated because we felt kids learn better when they feel good about themselves," she said. "People can learn to read and count with things besides textbooks."

In order to provide funding, the University asked for help from the city of Manhattan. The Human Relations Board was set up to monitor the program, and a graduate assistant was hired to be the executive director.

"The goals of the program have not changed," Stith said. "It has just become a great deal more organized through the years."

Stith said the program is not intended to be an extension of school for the students. The emphasis of friendship tutoring is on fellowship.

Most kids seem to enjoy the program, Pritz said. Some students even choose to come back, semester after semester.

"We know the Friendship Tutoring Program is worthwhile because it has lasted for so many years," Pritz said. "But the best indicator of its success is that so many children want to come back for more. They can really benefit from the friendship formed with the tutors."

Officials fire transportation head

By The Associated Press

DENVER — George R. Baker, head of the Denver office of the National Transportation Safety Board, has been fired after a probe into alleged improprieties — including a controversial investigation into possible causes of Colorado's worst private aircraft crash.

Baker is accused of using the federal safety agency to collect extensive technical data for longtime friend L.B. Ullstrom, an aviation lawyer involved in a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against Beech Aircraft Corp. of Wichita.

Investigators claim that Baker launched a probe into alleged icing problems with two Beech aircraft with the intention of turning the information over to Ullstrom.

Ullstrom represents the plaintiffs in the lawsuit, stemming from a 1980 crash near Parker which killed all 10 people aboard a Beech King Air 200 bound for Lufkin, Texas.

From October 1985 to April 1986, Baker assigned an investigator to the "special project." He said he did not know that Ullstrom, a close friend for the past 13 years, was still involved in the lawsuit until early March.

NTSB Managing Director J.B. Kissinger used correspondence to call that assertion "incredible."

According to a NTSB official letter from Washington, Beech contacted the agency in April after becoming concerned about icing flight tests and other information that Baker requested.

Kissinger wrote, "Because of the absence of any other plausible rationale and because of the extensive involvement of L.B. Ullstrom," the result was "an actual or apparent conflict of interest."

Ordinarily, such an investigation would be recommended as a topic for study by Washington, Kissinger said.

In July, Kissinger recommended Baker's removal from federal service, despite his "long, progressively responsible and generally exemplary work record with the board."

Baker, whose only other disciplinary action has been a week's suspension in 1970 for abusing his official privilege to fly, last worked on Aug. 29.

He blamed Beech officials for his firing, saying they complained only to blunt his investigation.

man mainly as an organizer of the group and a spokesperson for their ideas."

Epstein said although arguments are necessary to bring out opposing views, the chairman must be able to control the discussion.

"I'm more willing to jump in the fray and tell these people to shut up than Steven was," Epstein said.

An accomplishment the group made under Johnson's rule was to write a position paper against mandatory drug testing for athletes and all students, which was presented to the board Friday.

Johnson said the paper was written in response to the board's request for a report of drug-related policies on each campus. The report was to be used in a possible standardized policy for athletes in Regents schools.

He said others on the committee were afraid the testing would end up becoming a policy for all students.

"I don't follow that slippery slope argument," Johnson said.

Johnson said he supports K-State's current mandatory drug testing policy for athletes and does not believe it will spread to testing all students because of the administrative costs.

Johnson said he encouraged the other committee members to write the paper if they thought a drug testing policy would infringe on students' rights.

Epstein said mandatory drug testing violates students' rights by forcing them to testify against themselves.

"We're talking about the U.S. Constitution, a violation against the Fifth Amendment," Epstein said.

"The main argument against the drug testing is the privacy issue, and that was the basis for the paper," Johnson said.

He said he didn't believe privacy was a problem in K-State's policy, because results are kept confidential between the athlete and a drug rehabilitation counselor unless the problem persists.

He said he would be against drug testing for the entire student body.

"If you're going to test the student body, you might as well test society," he said.

the initial East-West security conference that ended in Helsinki, Finland, in 1975. It was the first East-West security agreement since the SALT II strategic arms limitation treaty, which never was ratified by the U.S. Senate but which both sides have claimed to observe.

The Stockholm conference was due to end at midnight Friday, but delegates stopped the clock one hour before deadline to pursue negotiations on the few remaining obstacles.

These included the size of military movements that would have to be announced to the other side and on-site inspections of each other's military forces.

Agreement was reached after intense discussions in small groups of military experts from NATO and the Warsaw Pact and, reportedly, private talks between the U.S. and Soviet delegation heads.

NATO had sought mutual notification for maneuvers involving as few as 6,000 troops. The Warsaw Pact initially wanted the figure set at 20,000. At the initial East-West security conference in 1975, the level for notification was set at maneuvers involving 25,000 troops.

The two sides compromised by setting two separate ceilings for notification and sending observers.

If one nation suspects another is conducting sizeable military maneuvers without notifying the other side, it can demand an on-site inspection using aircraft or land vehicles. The request must be made within 24 hours of the reported violation.

The two sides compromised on the number of on-site inspections a nation would have to allow, settling for at least three annually. However, each nation would be allowed to request only one inspection of another country's forces each year.

Each Nov. 15, participating nations must provide each other with a schedule of all planned military activities involving 40,000 or more troops for the next two-year period.

The agreement noted that respect for human rights is "a neccessary prequisite for peace and cooperation."

"With the combined efforts of more than 20 people, we worked the mud up by hand and foot Friday afternoon and evening."

The tournament attracted more than 700 people, including players and spectators.

For G.V. Salts, Student Foundation president for the fall semester and senior in architecture and design, he perceived the event as a fun time for all.

"It was like a big party for most people," Salts said. "They just wanted to have fun. Others were in it to win.

"It's the ooziest, smelliest experience you could ever have."

from Manhattan to Lawrence or vice versa, ending at whichever city would be that year's location for the K-State-KU football game.

This year's race was dubbed the "halfway there" race because the teams didn't travel the full distance to Lawrence, Siebes said.

The race was put together by the KSU Association of Residence Halls in an effort to promote residence hall living.

"We are trying to improve the image of the residence halls and this was a good way to kick off the year," Siebes said. "Everything ran really smoothly, and the weather was good."

Reagan demands Daniloff's release at U.N.

By The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — President Reagan told the United Nations Monday that there has been movement in U.S.-Soviet negotiations to reduce nuclear-missile arsenals, but condemned Moscow's detention of an American reporter as "a particularly disturbing example of Soviet transgressions against human rights."

"The world expects better," Reagan said in his fifth speech to the United Nations.

"It expects contributions to the cause of peace that only the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union can make."

Reagan again demanded the release of Nicholas Daniloff, the Moscow correspondent for U.S. News & World Report, and said the Soviet Union "bears the responsibility for the consequences of its action."

The president said there is no similarity in the cases against Daniloff and Gennadiy Zakharov, the Soviet physicist and U.N. employee arrested on spying charges a week before KGB agents plucked Daniloff from a Moscow street.

Reagan called Zakharov "an accused spy who should stand trial" and Daniloff "an innocent hostage who should be released."

Despite the strains in U.S.-Soviet relations caused by the reporter's indictment and the administration's expulsion of 25 Soviet diplomats from the United Nations, Reagan gave an up-beat account of negotiations in Geneva to reduce the nuclear arms race.

He confirmed that the United States was prepared to consider "an interim measure" to reduce intercontinental missiles, bombers and submarines by less than the 50 percent he initially had demanded.

At the same time, Reagan said, the Soviets have "embraced our idea" of radical cutbacks.

"So there has been movement," he said.

The Soviets had rejected the initial U.S. demand because it would have forced abandonment of many of the heavy land-based missiles that are the core of their nuclear arsenal.

In a conciliatory vein, Reagan said, "we have sought to take account of Soviet concerns." But, over the long haul, he emphasized that he seeks to halve strategic nuclear weapons on both sides.

Similarly, Reagan said he would like to see all medium-range U.S. and Soviet nuclear missiles in Europe scrapped.

"Again," he said, "if the Soviet Union insists on pursuing such a goal in stages, we are prepared to conclude an interim agreement without delay."

"All this gives me hope," Reagan told world leaders assembled for the annual special session of the U.N. General Assembly.

"I can tell you the exchanges between our two sides this summer could well have marked the beginning of a serious, productive negotiation on arms reductions.

"The ice of the negotiating stalemate could break — if both sides intensify their efforts in the new round of Geneva talks" that opened last week.

Besides long-range and medium-range missiles, these talks deal with space-based defense systems.

Reagan, however, gave no indication of U.S. concessions on his "Star Wars" research program, which the Soviets have condemned as threatening to expand the nuclear competition.

Nor did Reagan offer any appraisal of the message he received

Slattery says charges need investigation

By The Associated Press

FORT RILEY — Rep. Jim Slattery took an unannounced tour of Fort Riley Monday and promised to investigate allegations of poor workmanship on construction projects at the Army post.

At a news conference in Junction City after the surprise visit, Slattery said contractors, laborers, union representatives and private citizens told him they were concerned about work on several projects at the base.

"Examples of these concerns are lack of inspections by the corps (U.S. Army Corps of Engineers), use of foreign-made materials in construction, poor workmanship and the failure to post required notices and wages," said Slattery, who is a member of the House Budget Committee.

Allegations included problems with a roofing project, shoddy workmanship on barricks construction, use of an improper valve on a utility project and use of too much foreign steel on a petroleum depot project.

At a housing project, Tom Stoalabarger, post engineer, told Slattery that the material used on a second-layer roof apparently did not last as long as it should have under local weather conditions. On one unit, some of the shingles appeared to be loosening at the edges and several areas were sagging.

Stoalabarger said the out-of-state contractor, International Roofing, had attempted to hand seal some of the loose spots but refused to do anything else, saying it had completed the job.

"The project is somewhere in the neighborhood of $2 million and the fact of the matter is that it's a terribly inferior job," Slattery said. "The Army admits that and we're trying now to get the contractor back that did this work and try and get it done right."

Stoalabarger estimated that the contractor had completed about 75 percent of the roofing job, and had been paid for about that much work.

"At least we can identify who the contractor is and when I get back to Washington, I'm going to find out if that contractor is doing work other places in the country," Slattery said.

"I just believe that if this contractor will not get out here to Fort Riley and clean up the job he did here, then the Pentagon ought to be saying to him, 'You're not going to get anymore work with us,'" he said.

Hermann Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering, stresses a point to Alvin Compaan, professor of physics, during a forum about the Strategic Defense Initiative Monday afternoon in the Paslay Lecture Hall in Durland Hall. The forum was sponsored by the Society of Professional Engineers.

Forum addresses Star Wars defense strategies

By MARTA MONTGOMERY
Collegian Reporter

A forum Monday addressed an issue that scientists have considered a possibility since the '50s — a technological defense against nuclear weapons.

More than 100 people listened to Herman Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering, and Alvin Compaan, professor of physics, discuss the Strategic Defense Initiative, also known as "Star Wars."

Compaan summarized Star Wars as being "technologically naive and militarily dangerous," and said it is already having some effects which are injurious in the long range to U.S. technological and scientific establishments.

Campaan said SDI is an issue that needs to be discussed and thought about a great deal.

"The issue today is not a question of whether we should participate in weapons research," Campaan said. "The issue is whether we should participate in weapons research or any kind of scientific or technological research (just) for research's sake."

"We always have to be aware of the moral and ethical issues that are involved," he said.

He said the question that must be dealt with is, "What is really in the best interest of the United States?" He said that SDI is in the nation's worst interest.

Compaan said although some significant progress has been made in the three years since Reagan opened up funding for Star Wars, none of it can be described as "amazing."

In September 1985, a high-powered laser caused a Titan Missile casing to blow up during SDI testing. This incident was widely reported in the media, and became a "convenient demonstration" of what SDI would supposedly do, he said.

Compaan cited this incident as an example of "SDI in action" saying the demonstration was set up for maximum effect and if the cabin of the missile had not been pressurized, the resulting damage would not be any worse than what a blow torch could do.

Compaan is currently circulating a petition across the country asking scientists, engineers and mathemeticians not to request or accept funding for Star Wars research.

He said Reagan advertises SDI as "population defense." Other people use the more realistic description "missile defense," Compaan said.

"Others, when backed into the corner, will say it is an interesting research project," he said.

Donnert, who has worked in defense-related research for 30 years, said he came to the United States from Germany on an invitation from the government to work on nuclear weapons for the Department of Defense.

"The general idea is that you can detect enemy missiles while they are being launched from their silos," he said. The projected rate from launch pads to target can be separated into four segments, Donnert said.

The first segment, the boost phase, lasts until the engine of the missile quits operating. During the post-boost phase all the fuel is burnt off.

When the missile enters mid-course, the third phase, it opens up and releases individual warheads that are independently targeted.

University professor to counsel Weinberger before Pakistani visit

By SUE DAWSON
News Editor

A University professor of political science flew to Washington, D.C., Monday to brief Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger on Pakistani issues for Weinberger's upcoming trip to South Asia.

William Richter, head of the Department of Political Science, received a phone call last week from Weinberger's office asking him to join three others in a discussion of Pakistan.

"I think it's nice for Kansas State to be asked (to talk to Weinberger), especially when we have something to offer," Richter said.

Pakistan is one of the largest U.S. aid recipients, Richter said, especially in the area of military aid.

"We are just completing one five-year (military aid) program and are about to begin another," he said.

Weinberger's trip to South Asia will include a visit to India as well. Richter said India has the third largest army in the world, with sophisticated weapons and aircraft.

"Tensions have been increasing a bit between India and Pakistan, and both countries are suffering a bit of internal pressure," Richter said.

Richter, in the last decade, has written extensively on Pakistan for publications such as Asian Survey, Current History and Newsday. He was in Washington, D.C., this summer to attend a luncheon at the State Department for Pakistan Prime Minister Mohammad Khan Junejo, and one year ago met with Pakistan President Zia ul-Haq. Richter has also talked with Benazir Bhutto, major challenger to the present regime.

Hayden says embargo statements distorted in Docking radio, TV ads

By The Associated Press

Election '86

TOPEKA — Republican governor candidate Mike Hayden said Monday that radio and television commercials being run by his Democratic opponent, Tom Docking, distort his position on grain sales to South Africa and constitute a "campaign of deceit."

Hayden told a Statehouse news conference the advertising asserts that Hayden has proposed a selective grain embargo on South Africa similar to one imposed by former President Jimmy Carter on the Soviet Union in January 1980.

In the ads, Docking says he will "fight" Mike Hayden or anyone else who tries to impose an embargo on sale of Kansas wheat to South Africa, because embargos hurt Kansas farmers economically.

"I've never said that I favor any such thing, and I deeply resent having my statements distorted and words put in my mouth by my opponent," Hayden told reporters.

"I have said I favor economic sanctions against South Africa. I have also made it clear that I believe these sanctions should be complete — imposed on everything from cars to computers — so that all Americans will share in the expression of outrage at racial persecution.

"To equate this belief with a selective grain embargo like the one I opposed is pure folly, and it is deceptive politics at its worst."

However, Mike Swenson, Docking's communications coordinator, said Hayden is the one distorting the record.

"We need to make clear that the only person being deceitful here is Mr. Hayden," Swenson said. "It's very obvious he continues to try to backtrack from his statement in August in Manhattan, when he said he strongly opposed the sale of grain to South Africa. He just flat said it and everybody knows it.

"The other point I would make is he continues to rail away on the em-

Fugitive vows not to be taken alive

WRIGHT CITY, Mo. — A fugitive who vowed he woudn't be taken alive after killing two people fled westward Monday night, stealing more than a half-dozen cars and trucks and abducting at least five people briefly in a three-state crime spree.

Michael W. Jackson of Indianapolis was seen by police in the eastern Missouri town of Wright City in a stolen Cadillac, and he shot and wounded an officer who tried to stop the car, said O'Fallon Police Officer John Fomera. The officer suffered a superficial wound to the forehead.

Jackson, 40, was believed to be fleeing on foot near Wright City, about 35 miles west of St. Louis, according to Fomera and the Missouri Highway Patrol.

The manhunt was centered in Warren County near Wright City, with at least 14 Missouri Highway Patrol officers and two helicopters, according to Ralph Biele of the Highway Patrol in Jefferson City.

"Apparently the guy is still on foot. He is considered armed and extremely dangerous," Biele said. Jackson, whose face was painted silver and black was believed to be carrying a shotgun and a pistol.

Agents investigate survivalist camp

OMAHA, Neb. — FBI agents using special equipment last week found no weapons, ammunition or bodies buried at a former survivalist cult farm near Rulo, Richardson County authorities said Monday.

The investigation "turned up no additional evidence of criminal activity," County Attorney Doug Merz said.

Sheriff Cory McNabb said the search of the farm was warranted because of rumors about what might still be buried on the property.

Authorities found the bodies of a man and a child in unmarked graves on the farm in 1985. Cult leader Michael Ryan has been convicted of murder in both deaths.

Carlin to promote seat belt law

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin will serve as honorary chairman of a committee which will promote compliance with the state's new mandatory seat belt law.

That law has no teeth in it at present, because the Legislature delayed imposition of a $10 fine for violating the law until July 1, 1987. Law enforcement officers can give warning tickets now, but the fine doesn't kick in until the middle of next year.

Name of the promotional committee is Kansas Clicks Committee. Its goal is to educate Kansans that wearing their seat belts can save lives and reduce injuries, Bill Henry, director of Kansas Coalition for Safety Belts, told a Statehouse news conference Monday.

State firm wins $8 million contract

WASHINGTON — A Hutchinson firm has won an $8 million contract to help build a grain storage and unloading facility in Taiwan, Sen. Bob Dole announced Monday.

Biehler Sales Inc. will be a subcontractor and help the Taiwan Agricultural and Industrial Development Corp., part of the Taiwanese government, build the $26 million grain project at Taichung Harbor, said Dole, R-Kan.

"Because approximately 75 percent of the equipment and supplies used to build the facility will come from our state, this contract represents real progress in showing Kansas companies are marketable throughout the world," Dole said.

Woman dies avoiding man's kiss

LOS ANGELES — A woman trying to avoid a man's kiss plummeted to her death from a bridge, and the man also was killed when he fell as he apparently tried to save her, police said Monday.

The man and woman, who died Sunday, were not identified, said Detective John Dunkin. They were wearing sweatshirts and sweatpants and were not carrying identification.

Witnesses reported seeing the couple arguing while they were on the bridge, said police officer Stuart Foreman.

The woman was sitting on a railing when the man attempted to kiss her, Foreman said. She dodged his kiss and slipped off the bridge, 50 feet to railroad tracks below.

When the man tried to keep her from falling, he also fell off the bridge, Foreman said.

The couple died of multiple injuries suffered in the fall, said coroner's investigator Juan Jiminez. The deaths were ruled accidental.

Christmas kittens carry $1,400 tag

DALLAS — The guide to seasonal shopping chic in Texas, the Neiman-Marcus Christmas catalog, is offering His-Her gifts this year that are simply feline.

Billed as a "leopard for your living room," the catalog suggests giving a couple a pair of specially bred spotted kittens that carry a price tag of $1,400 each.

The catalog, famous for lavish gifts sprinkled among more conventional Christmas gift items, also offers a portrait session with pop artist Andy Warhol for the rich who want to be famous.

For $35,000, the recipient will be flown to New York to be painted in Warhol's studio. But there's a limit, only three people can buy that gift.

"A wonderful part is that later you receive 900 reproductions for Christmas cards for 1987," said Pat Morgan, Neiman's vice president of mail order merchandising. "This is not like anything we've had in the past."

Israeli troops gather along border

METULLA, Israel — Hundreds of Israeli troops massed on the ready along the northern border Monday, and an official said they would move into south Lebanon if needed to aid an Israeli-backed militia under attack from Shiite Moslem guerrillas.

Residents of this tiny border town said they had not seen such a concentration of troops at the frontier since Israel pulled the bulk of its forces from Lebanon in June 1985.

The official denied such action reflected a policy change. He said any operation would be aimed at "showing the Shiites on the fringes of the security belt that it doesn't pay to give shelter and support to Hezbollah."

(Telephoned reports to Beirut, the capital of Lebanon, said Israel Monday closed all access to its self-designated "security zone" in south Lebanon amid reports the Israeli army was moving reinforcements for a crackdown on Shiite guerrillas.

(The reports from the southern port city of Tyre and the Bekaa Valley town of Hasbaya in the foothills of Mount Hermon said the area was closed to civilian traffic and declared off-limits for reporters from Israel and Lebanon alike.)

Israel has blamed Hezbollah, an Iranian-backed, Shiite extremist organization, for attacks which killed five United Nations peacekeepers and at least 12 Israeli-allied Lebanese militiamen in the past six weeks.

Contaminated soil at mall site not hazardous, official says

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

Gasoline-contaminated soil at the Manhattan mall site does not appear to be hazardous, but it is slowing construction, said Jerry Petty, deputy director for public works.

"All indications to date have been that it's not a severe problem," Petty said.

"As of now we've had enough problems with weather and rain, so this is not the biggest factor holding back construction work," he said. "It's still a question mark."

The city is waiting for test results from Briggs Associates, Rockland, Mass., to determine the extent of the contamination. The soil testing firm will also advise Manhattan on how to solve the problem. Results are expected within the week.

Five underground gasoline storage tanks were found several weeks ago by construction crews digging at the site. Two of the tanks had been leaking gas, possibly for up to 20 years, a Kansas Department of Health and Environment geologist estimated.

Currently, the soil is being removed from the downtown redevelopment area and replaced with fresh earth from a borrow site east of town. A borrow site is an area from which soil is taken for construction use.

"When the contamination was identified, we notified the health department. All the advice we got when we first found the problem was that the best solution is to remove the soil and haul it off, then fill the hole," Petty said.

"The hole kept growing, and the contamination kept spreading. When we reached the point where contamination was growing, we jointly decided with the developer to find a more cost-effective method of dealing with the problem," he said.

Briggs Associates is to provide that solution when it concludes the soil analysis. The firm is testing for volatile concentrations of benzene, tolulene and other compounds which may have resulted from years of gas leaks.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment is analyzing water samples for volatile organic compounds and oil or grease. The department is also testing for Resource Conservation and Recovery Act metals, placing the most emphasis on lead because it is toxic in high concentrations. RCRA metals have limits on their concentration levels in resources.

"As far as the water supply is concerned, the levels of gas are not posing a health hazard. Our tests and analysis to date indicate that it is not flowing toward water wells," Petty said.

Groundwater in the mall area does not flow west toward city wells, which the mall will be using when it's completed. Instead it goes east of Manhattan, toward the Kansas and Big Blue rivers. However, the contamination should evaporate before the water reaches the rivers, Petty said.

He said although gas may have seeped out of the underground tanks for years, it did not seem to harm the buildings which previously stood on the site.

"What can happen in contamination or spills like this is that existing buildings, especially those with full basements, allow gas to seep in. It can leak into a building or basement through a hole and actually contaminate the environment in the basement with the smell of gas," he said. "If levels are high enough, it could pose a health hazard."

No one had ever reported smelling gas in the old buildings, however.

If the leaks had not been discovered during construction, probably the only problem once the mall was built would be odor, Petty said. However, neither the city nor the developer wanted to take any chances.

"The city has a responsibility through contractual agreements with the developer to provide a site free of hazards. The developer wants to make sure the city is doing that, and he also doesn't want to build on a hazardous site," he said.

Until test results arrive from the soil testing firm, Petty said the city will continue to remove contaminated soil from the mall site. The soil is being used in a fill for the relocation of railroad tracks.

"It's not a wasted material," he said. "One way to clean up soil like that is to aerate it (allow oxygen to reach it). We're using it as a railroad fill in a wide open space. The contamination will volatilize and aerate into the atmosphere."

Because the soil is being placed in an open area, the contamination should diffuse in very low concentrations and pose no environmental hazards, Petty said.

Of the 154 buried petroleum storage tanks in Riley County in 1984, the Environmental Protection Agency estimates that as many as 30 percent may be leaking. However, there are few EPA regulations on installation and inspection of the tanks, the agency said.

Student commons area becomes meeting room

By JULIE ANDSAGER
Collegian Reporter

When the student commons area in the Veterinary Clinical Sciences Building closed early this summer, some students were upset.

However, the closing has not caused problems for the students and has benefited the faculty, said Jerry Gillespie, professor of surgery and medicine.

"At first the leadership of the (senior) class expressed concern, but most felt that we acted responsibly and needed the room," Gillespie said.

"It hasn't really affected us," said Mike Apley, senior in veterinary medicine. "We've been so busy with clinics. If we need to study or anything, we have food animal and equine conference rooms to study in."

The room, E 107, was mainly used by seniors during their clinical shifts. It contained a television and several couches to allow students to relax while on late-night duty. However, the room was intended for use as a conference room and library, Gillespie said.

"Now it's used for meetings and as a seminar room for the hospital. We have an expanded Clinical Science Council, with just under 20 members, that meets once a week and needed a room," Gillespie said. "There are also five open positions in the college, so we have seminars weekly. We also needed library space."

Two other student lounges are located in the Veterinary Medical Center — one in Trotter Hall and one in the hospital. The lounge in Trotter Hall has a television and couches, but students there cannot hear themselves being paged. To remedy this problem, beepers are available for checkout.

During late nights, students on duty can leave the phone number of the Trotter Hall lounge with the emergency desk receptionist in case they are needed. During the day, students are usually too busy to spend time in Trotter Hall, Apley said.

The hospital's student lounge and conference study rooms are not equipped with couches or televisions, but the students don't really need these while on duty, Apley said.

"When they're here to attend patients, they need to attend patients and not be taking naps," Gillespie said.

"There was a TV in the other lounge, but it's worked out well that there isn't in these. Now it's easier to study and not be tempted to watch TV. If you really don't want to miss a movie or something, you can check out a beeper and go to Trotter," Apley said.

"The staff uses the (former student lounge) a lot. It would have been different if they just locked it and not used it, but this is working out for all of us," Apley said.

Soviet police thwart attempted hijacking

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Two men seized a Soviet airliner at a Ural mountains airport in an aborted weekend hijacking in which the two gunmen, two passengers and two policemen were killed, Tass said Monday. It said the men were drug addicts.

The official news agency said that before commandeering the Tu-134 Aeroflot plane, with 76 passengers aboard early Saturday, the hijackers shot and killed two police officers during a car chase to the airport.

The thwarted hijacking occurred at the airport in Ufa, capital of Bashkir autonomous republic, about 700 miles east of Moscow. The plane apparently never left the ground before it was stormed and retaken by security agents.

Details were not complete, but Tass said "two armed criminals" whom it identified as N.R. Mantsev and S.V. Yagmurzhi were chased through the city of Ufa toward the airport in a taxicab they had seized.

The hijackers killed militia Senior Sgt. Z.N. Akhtyamov and Junior Sgt. A.G. Galeyev, the report said.

At the airport, Mantsev and Yagmurzhi stormed aboard the Tu-134, which was bound from Kiev to the city of Nizhnevartovsk, Tass said.

"During the seizure of the plane, the criminals opened fire and killed two passengers," it said.

Security police and uniformed militia undertook "decisive measures" to recapture the plane, Tass said.

The agency said police killed both hijackers, but no passenger or crew member was injured during recapture of the plane.

Court dismisses Carlin from rights suit

Case reopens desegregation debate

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A federal judge Monday dismissed Gov. John Carlin as a defendant in the reopened Brown versus Topeka Board of Education school desegregation case.

U.S. District Court Judge Richard D. Rogers granted a motion filed by Carlin's attorney, Carl Gallagher of Lawrence, to drop the governor from the lawsuit. The judge agreed Carlin had no direct involvement in the case and was not a proper defendant.

The case was reopened in 1979 by plaintiffs who contend Topeka never fully integrated its schools after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the "separate but equal" doctrine in American education in 1954.

They allege de facto segregation has remained in Topeka schools, with heavy concentrations of black children attending public schools on the city's east side, while schools in the western and southern portions of the city are predominately white. The plaintiffs contend the school district should have done more to achieve a better racial mix in its schools.

School officials maintain the distribution of black and white students is dictated by housing patterns, and contend minority children have equal facilities and educational opportunities.

Remaining defendants are Topeka Unified School District No. 501 and the Kansas Board of Education.

The case goes to trial before Rogers Oct. 6. Attorneys met with Rogers in court Monday to iron out final issues in preparation for the trial.

During the pre-trial conference, lawyers disclosed for the first time that the Brown plaintiffs had offered to settle the suit.

However, Gary Sebelius, the lead attorney for USD 501, said the plaintiffs wanted so much in a settlement that he did not regard it as negotiable. He said they sought more through settlement than they are asking in their lawsuit.

Nevertheless, Rogers asked Sebelius to take the offer back to the school board and see if they could make a counter offer.

Details of the settlement offer, which came three weeks ago in a letter from the plaintiffs' attorney to the board, were not made public during Monday's court session.

None of the attorneys seemed optimistic that a settlement was likely.

All parties said they were ready to begin the trial Oct. 6. It is expected to last four weeks.

Rogers granted Gallagher's motion to have Carlin dismissed as a defendant without additional argument. The judge ruled on the basis of those written arguments.

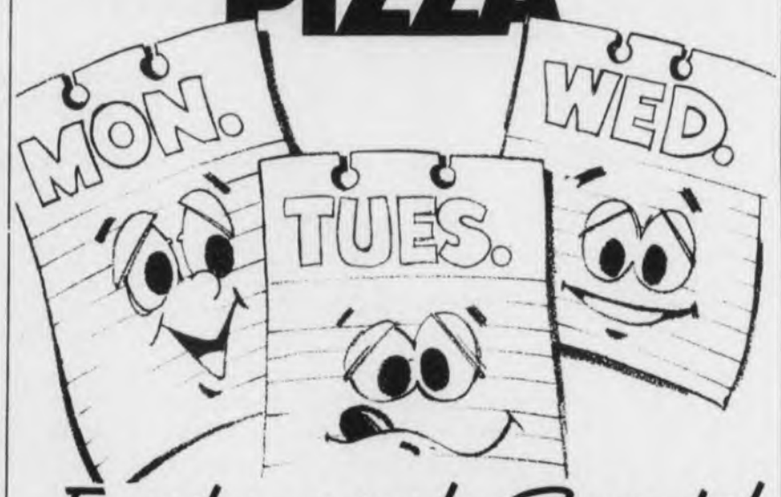
The judge said he agreed with the plaintiffs in the Brown case, who named Carlin as a defendant, that a governor has a constitutional duty to enforce the laws of the land. However, he said as a practical matter Carlin has had no involvement in the operation of Topeka's schools.

"I fail to see the practical purpose to keeping the governor in this case," Rogers said. "I don't think it can be said the governor participated in the decisions of the school district. I don't think the constitution authorizes civil action against the governor."

Rogers said he would issue a written order dismissing Carlin from the suit, elaborating then on his reasons.

In his brief, Gallagher contended Carlin has no authority to order desegregation in the Topeka school district, has no constitutional authority over the state Board of Education, and denied having knowledge of any racial segregation in the Topeka district.

The plaintiffs in the case argued the governor has authority over federal funds flowing into the school district and since the Brown decision, governors of Kansas have four times declined to approve funds to be used for desegregation purposes. They also argued the governor had a constitutional duty to help end segregation in the school system.



The judge also ordered Dan Biles, the attorney for the state Board of Education, to answer a question posed to the board during the interrogatory phase of the trial preparation.

That question involves what steps, if any, the state board has taken over the years to insure that the Topeka Unified School District No. 501 complied with the 1954 Brown decision of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Chris Hanson, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney from New York City who is the lead lawyer for the plaintiffs in the reopened case, argued he fears the state may be trying to spring a surprise in its defense and doesn't want to tip its hand by answering the question.

Bus service abandons customers in Kansas

The decision by Trailways Lines Inc. officials to abandon the company's bus routes in Kansas will leave many riders in a lurch. Trailways is the largest provider of bus service in the state.

The reasons cited by Trailways for the cutoff of service are a lower number of riders brought on, in part, by cheaper gasoline and airfares. Malcolm Myers, Trailways' vice president for traffic, said the company was seeking curtailment of the routes to ensure economic survival.

While the economic reasons cited by the company for the cutback are valid, there are underlying reasons why Trailways and other bus lines are faced with declining ridership, most notably an image problem.

A sluggish economy, in this case, is not nearly as damaging as a poor image.

Such an image is generated by matters beyond the companies' control, as well as those within their control. For example, the public's perception that primarily low-income and vagabond people ride the bus is not justified.

There are many who ride for the convenience and necessity and are not "undesirables." Families, children and the elderly rely on the bus as a primary mode of transportation.

However, actions of the companies foster the negative image. Being forced to catch a bus at 4 a.m. does not encourage heavy ridership. Convenient scheduling amounts to good business.

Waiting in dirty, small and dark terminals is also discouraging to prospective customers. These are management problems bus companies could correct that would increase usage and ultimately their profits.

However, Trailways has already committed to pulling the bulk of its bus lines from Kansas. At this point, the company should be informed that the rationale for the cut in service doesn't matter to the residents of the 57 Kansas cities that will be abandoned.

With proper management and promotion, Trailways could have made a profit in Kansas. The company was needed and wanted.

Parents' Day honors should cover singles

In this era of specialization, there are special days for everything. Thanks to the card and gift industry, we have Mother's Day, Father's Day, Friendship Day, Grandparents' Day — the list is endless.

K-State carries on this tradition with Parents' Day, the day set aside for Mom and Pop to come up and visit their "pride and joy" in his or her serene learning atmosphere and enjoy a Wildcat football game as a family.

To add extra glamour to this picture-perfect day, a set of All-University Honorary Parents are named. "Junior" has the opportunity to write an essay about his perfect set of parents and their perfect life. You know the type of family setting — the mom-dad-two-kids-and-a-dog type family.

The only problem with this concept is that most families are not "the All-American Family." A government survey conducted in 1980 found that one out of every two marriages in the United States ends in divorce. Other parents are left single by the death of their spouse.

The concept of honorary parents has been liberalized some by opening the contest to more than one set of parents from each living organization. All University students have the opportunity to nominate their parents. Now maybe Parents' Day needs to go a step further and have a separate honorary mother and honorary father.

By splitting up the team honor, and facing the realities of this day and age, students with single parents could take this opportunity to let their parent know that they are appreciated.

Being a single parent is not an easy task. Society needs to step into this era and change its way of thinking. Single parents deserve recognition, too.

Comfortable poverty

Editor,

Re: Dan Owens' column "East, West discover common goals" in the Sept. 12 Collegian.

It's too bad that Dan Owens did not have a better command of appropriate statistics at hand in his discussion of East-West economics in Moscow. I believe that most of the people officially below the "poverty line" in America have a better standard of living than most of the people in the Soviet Union with "jobs."

Why does their government restrict travel? Because they know that as much as the people love their own country, the quality of life is so much better over here that the mass exodus would embarrass the Socialist government.

Why has our poverty rate steadily increased in the 1980s? Because we keep raising the line as fast as the standard of living goes up. My mother's income is below the poverty line, but she lives as well as I do (by choice) on a comfortable state salary.

The rich get richer in America — that is the Great American Dream. But the poor don't really get poorer, they just stay about the same. It looks worse for them because the average keeps going up.

University ignores early president

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

History is the "in" thing at K-State. Secretary of Education William Bennett and President Jon Wefald have in recent weeks emphasized the role history plays in our society. It seems as though history has been given a new lease on life.

Being somewhat of a history buff myself, I decided to take a new look at this ancient subject. But where do I start? The Roman Empire? The Incas? Reaganomics? Because this train of thought was inspired by the University president, I thought I might take a look at this honored position. What I discovered was the lost president of K-State, Thomas E. Will.

You say you don't know who any of the past presidents of K-State were? You are mistaken. The names of Denison, Anderson and Fairchild adorn not only buildings on campus, but also streets in Manhattan. In fact, all the former presidents have buildings named after them except two. This number may soon drop to one, as the biochemistry building now under construction could be named after the newly departed University President Duane Acker. This leaves only the forgotten president, Thomas Will.

Political turmoil across the state was the setting for the Will administration. The Populist movement in Kansas was strong at that time (and is threatening to make a comeback). Populists were agrarian reformers who sought to change the poor economic conditions farmers were living with in those days. Their proposals for economic reform were considered socialistic. For example, collective ownership of public utilities and modification of the current market system were proposed.

Gov. Lorenzo Lewelling understood the value of education and made sure the Kansas Board of Regents reflected this new political persuasion by appointing a Populist majority. Then entered Thomas Will.

Will, a Harvard graduate, was appointed by the Regents as professor of political economy in 1894. That year, a Republican governor took office, but he couldn't do much about the Populist Regents. He was able to slow their advances, but he ran out of time. Another Populist, John Leedy, was elected governor in 1896.

The Populists were quick to get rid of President George Fairchild and appoint Will in his place. At age 36, he was K-State's youngest president. Will had never indicated a desire to become president, nor did he have any part in the ouster of Fairchild. He just happened to be in the right place at the right time.

Because of the political turmoil, Will served only two years. But he did a lot in his short time at K-State. He upgraded the faculty by appointing four people with doctorates. Up to that time, there was only one doctor on the faculty. His appointments included the first woman doctor to teach at K-State.

Will also reorganized the educational program. Up to then, there was one set curriculum for men, agriculture, and one for women, home economics. Will divided these into separate programs: agriculture, engineering, home economics and general. These divisions serve as the basis for our existing college system.

This reorganization also improved course offerings. While free electives were still not permitted, substitutions could be made with faculty approval. A new emphasis was placed on the social sciences, including economics, civics and history (deja vu?). The Department of Speech was created. The division of programs gave birth to the College of Engineering, expanding the institution's basic design. Without this, all engineering students would be going to the University of Kansas.

Some of Will's changes were not popular with the citizens of Manhattan. There were large outcries when a bookstore and dining hall were opened on campus. Protest was spurred further by rumors that a dormitory might be built. Owners of boarding houses and the bookstore claimed Will was turning K-State into a Socialist institution.

The Populist Party suffered heavy losses statewide due to the mudslinging campaign waged by Republicans. The Populists were labled as Socialists and lost control of the statehouse in 1898. The Board of Regents was subsequently packed with Republicans who replaced Thomas Will as K-State president. They also got rid of three of the doctors he had appointed earlier. But the students wouldn't let the reforms made under Will slip away. They submitted petitions to keep the dining room open and to retain the curriculum changes. The reforms remained largely in place.

So goes the story of Thomas Will. Political events beyond his control propelled him to power and then kicked him out. His name has been buried in the history books for a long time, but his policies survived. Think what K-State would be like if it wasn't fo Thomas Will — no bookstore, no dining hall, no Union. There would be only the colleges of Agriculture and Home Economics. Evidence of his presence is everywhere — everywhere but on a building. It is time we honor Thomas Will for the extraordinary advances he made in two short years. He gave students freedom, while former President Duane Acker sold them a coliseum. So whose name should we put on the new biochemistry building?

U.S. allies show two-faced attitude

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

The Stars and Stripes is set fire and carried through their streets burning to ashes. They have anti-U.S. demonstrations where dummies of our president are hung by a noose. They vandalize U.S. embassies, harass American tourists and conduct other hate-America activities.

Where are these incidents occurring? In the Soviet Union? Libya? Iran? No, in fact, they're common incidents taking place in nations that claim to be our allies — in Western Europe, Japan, the South Pacific and elsewhere.

The attitude of our allies is more than public opinion; it's public policy. A recent display of this arose in April when the United States conducted an air raid on Libya in retaliation for their state-sponsored terrorism. Neither the French nor the Spanish would let us fly over their airspace and the rest of our allies sharply denounced the administration's action. The reason they did not support our cause was that their method of dealing with enemy aggression is cowardism. In essence, they showed us they are not allies, but fair-weather friends. When the going gets tough, America stands alone.

The United States, on the other hand, does not turn its back on our allies. When Great Britain forced Argentina out of the Falkland Islands in 1982, they did so with our open support. But when U.S. forces liberated Grenada in 1983, our fair-weather friends, including the British, publicly criticized our action. After the incident was completed and successful, they gave official backing to the idea. How noble of them.

The difficulties the United States faces with its allies arise from its responsibility as leader and defender of the free world. Since World War II, we have assumed this role and recommitted ourselves to it through the rebuilding of post-war Europe and Japan, and by going face to face with Soviet aggression. President John F. Kennedy made our dedication clear when he stated in his inaugural address: "Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, support any friend, oppose any foe in order to assure the survival and success of liberty."

While U.S. allies support the idea of the United States protecting the world's free people, they don't realize that a modern military defense is necessary to fulfill this responsibility. Instead of putting their money where their mouth is by helping us perform our duty, they have chosen to cop out of their responsibilities. Many European nations were hesitant to accept cruise and Pershing missiles on their soil while several refused. Meanwhile, New Zealand refuses to harbor U.S. naval vessels that carry nuclear weapons.

All of our allies, and even neutral countries, enjoy either direct or indirect protection from our armed forces at a price that is relatively free to them considering the costs of modern defense. While most of these nations have their own military, they depend on the United States to deter major threats. For example, the Soviet Union doesn't avoid invasion of West Berlin because of the German army, but because it has the United States' protection.

When the United States insists that the allies pull their weight in military defense, they accuse us of being warmongers. Author Paul Johnson invalidated this claim when he wrote: "The point is missed that America is fundamentally a pacifist country, that in the 1930s it had only the 16th-largest Army in the world. European democratic statesmen begged the U.S. in vain to emerge from isolation and avert the coming war. The U.S. became a major military power soley as a result of World War II and its desperate aftermath. America had learned the lesson and has done her international duty ever since." By fulfilling our duties for the past 40 years, America has countered enemy threats and force, thus preventing shifts in the world balance of power.

Even in trying to use peaceful methods to solve international problems, the United States has not been successful at getting its allies to cooperate. When innocent Americans were slain in the Rome and Vienna airport massacres in December by Libyan-backed Arab terrorists, the Reagan administration asked our allies to join us in giving up economic interests in Libya by imposing sanctions. Every one of our fair-weather friends refused. Apparently they are more interested in money than human life.

USDA officials train in unique curriculum

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

K-State is currently the only school in the United States offering courses that will fulfill U.S. Department of Agriculture requirements for persons wishing to be food technologists.

"The overall plan of the agency is to provide better protection to the consumer," said Paul Scroggs, program review officer with the USDA. "At the present time, there is no in-house training to help processing inspectors meet the new requirements."

Scroggs said this caused the agency to come up with a list of courses needed to adequately train personnel for the food technologist positions.

"Universities across the country are encouraged to fulfill these needs," he said.

The title of food technologist is a new position recently created by the USDA in order to keep abreast of changes in the industry and complex technology used when preparing meat and poultry for market.

"Any meat or poultry that is transported across state lines is inspected by a USDA food inspector," Scroggs said.

Currently, inspectors check live animals for diseases, inspect the butchered animals' viscera, and check cooked, cured, canned and processed meats.

The food technologist will have a more in-depth understanding of the production process, food chemistry, nutritional content and additives of meat and poultry, said Bill Lockhart, one of K-State's coordinators for the program.

Currently, the USDA employs 7,500 food inspectors and plans to hire about 1000 food technologists in the next several years. The food technologists will come partially from persons already serving as food inspectors, with the remainder coming through new hirings.

K-State has more than 250 people participating in the program this semester. These students are distributed throughout 25 states across the United States, Lockhart said.

The program is a cooperative venture among the K-State College of Human Ecology, Continuing Education and the USDA.

"USDA in Washington announced the need for courses and we ere in the position to offer them," said Frank Cunningham, coordinating instructor for the program.

"We wanted a program that would meet the educational needs of the meat and poultry inspectors and would be the same high quality as the food science courses K-State offers on campus," Lockhart said.

K-State utilized current classes, but altered the mode of delivery.

"Food processing inspectors work different shifts and can't always make it to a class situation at a certain time," Cunningham said. "Earning a living comes first, so these students need a delivery system that allows flexibility."

Students can take the classes on campus in the traditional classroom situation, through video and audio cassettes or through independent guided studies and audio teleconferencing. Students take proctored exams and then mail them back to K-State.

"The USDA employees are motivated to participate in the program because it gives them the opportunity for professional advancement and protects their present positions if budget cuts are made in inspection personnel," Lockhart said.

"They are mature individuals, who have jobs and are looking at the education as a way to seek advancement in their careers in the food industry," Cunningham said. "The grade averages are very high which speaks well for the USDA employees, the kind of job they are currently doing and their interest in the field and the future of food quality control."

Scroggs said a food technologist can advance within the USDA whereas a food inspector cannot. The USDA is considering phasing out the food inspector position over a 10-year period.

East-West nations adopt security pact

By The Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — A 35-nation conference on Monday formally adopted the first East-West security agreement since SALT II, and diplomats said it could be a step toward improved superpower relations.

The conference did not deal with actual disarmament or nuclear weapons. Its goal was to reduce the risk of a military surprise attack or conventional war breaking out by misunderstanding in Europe.

Delegates toasted the agreement with champagne, ending 32 months of prolonged deliberations among the United States, Canada, the Soviet Union and all European countries except Albania.

The accord is politically binding and when ratified will come into force Jan. 1, 1987.

Agreement was reached late Sunday when Soviet and U.S. negotiators compromised on arrangements for notification, observation and on-site inspection of military maneuvers.

It was the first East-West security agreement this decade, the first during Ronald Reagan's presidency, and the first since the still unratified U.S.-Soviet strategic arms limitations accord in 1979.

The 35 countries are scheduled to review the results of the Stockholm conference and other offshoots of the 1975 Helsinki Accords at a follow-up meeting in Vienna, starting Nov. 4.

During the final session Monday morning, the conference clock remained at 10:56 p.m., the time it was stopped last Friday, Sept. 19. Friday midnight was the original deadline for the conference. Delegates had to "freeze" time because issues remained unresolved.

"We have taken an important step toward reducing the risk of military confrontation," Robert L. Barry, chief U.S. negotiatior at the talks, said in a statement.

The agreement expanded on similar measures included at Helsinki in 1975.

Dedication names library 'center of excellence'

By LISA SHEIKH
Collegian Reporter

The Weigel Library of Architecture and Design was named a "center of excellence" by Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, in a dedication Saturday at the library in Seaton Hall.

The event was attended by David and John Weigel, sons of the late Paul Weigel, in whose honor the library was named; Mark Lapping, dean of architecture and design; and faculty and students from architecture and design.

The library was expanded this summer, with additional space provided by the College of Architecture and Design. Additional allocated funds were provided by Farrell Library.

Saturday's event was "a celebration of the new space, as well as a dedication of this center of excellence," said Pat Weisenburger, Weigel librarian. "Now we can concentrate on increasing quality through a greater acquisition of funds."

"This is the first time, really, that we've tried something like this," Hobrock said. "We've been trying so hard to build quantity that we have not had time to look at quality."

The architecture and design collection was chosen because it had commanded the attention of Weigel for so many years, Hobrock said.

"We wanted to choose (the collection) that already had a great amount of merit, and we wanted to make it the best in the Midwest," he said.

The reason the collection is already so good, Hobrock said, is because of Weigel's total dedication to its cause. As department head of the College of Architecture and Allied Arts from 1924 to 1954, Weigel took upon himself the task of establishing a departmental library and then purchasing the necessary books and materials, among which are included some comparatively rare volumes.

"And that is the treasure that makes this library so special," Weisenburger said.

She said within these rare volumes are illustrations, detailed sketches and photos of French and English cathedrals, opera houses and city halls. The most outstanding volume, she said, contains a collection of Peranesi engravings, several of on display Saturday.

The architecture library is one of Farrell's four official branches. The other three are the chemistry, physics and veterinary medicine libraries. Hobrock said they hope to select one more branch to expand this year, although they are not yet certain which it will be.

It is the sense of pride or ownership a department develops toward the branch libraries, he said, that makes them so unique.

"The branch libraries really are jewels in our system," Hobrock said. "The collections are very precisely developed for the program. They serve a very specific purpose."

President Jon Wefald tries out a new Louisville Slugger baseball bat, one of two that was given to him Monday. The bats were presented to Wefald by Jack Hillerich, president of Hillerich & Bradsby of Louisville, Ky.

Slugger bats provided for K-State's 'Natural'

By DAVID WAGNER
Collegian Reporter

University President Jon Wefald, who claims to of have owned a bat which made him hit like "The Natural," was presented with two bats Monday courtesy of Louisville Slugger.

"I used to play softball a lot and owned a bat which I could really hit with," Wefald said. "But one day a player on our team borrowed it...and broke it when he hit the ball. Since then, I never have hit the same without it."

Jack Hillerich, president of Hillerich & Bradsby of Louisville, Ky., made the presentation. The company has expressed interest in producing a baseball bat designed by Larry Noble, professor of physical education, dance and leisure studies.

Louisville Slugger is buying exclusive rights to Noble's innovative design which features a new location of a bat's "sweet spot."

Noble discovered a way to move the "sweet spot," or center of percussion, in hollow-walled aluminum softball bats by placing a solid, firmly adhered weight inside the bat.

No previous design has been able to control its location, although various bats have used different formulas for weight distribution.

"The claims are interesting and would make a difference," Hillerich said. "Hopefully, we will be able to work something out and eventually market the bat."

While here on a research visit, Hillerich and George Manning, vice president of technical services for Louisville Slugger, took advantage of the opportunity to make the presentation to Wefald, Noble and John Mingle, executive vice president of research services and patent attorney for the University.

The bat's were "personalized" with the names of Wefald and the University.

"Where's the sweet spot?" Wefald asked. "Maybe I could hit a few homers with this."

The two Louisville Slugger representatives, who arrived Monday and will be here through today, will be lab testing the design of Noble's bat for practicality and will try to determine the feasibility of producing it.

Hillerich said production could start "real quick" once the test period, which also includes a field test, is concluded.

"We have good feelings about this bat and hope very much to see it manufactured and marketed soon," Hillerich said.

An official patent has not yet been issued on the bat, but Noble is quite confident it will be approved soon.

Noble has been working with the KSU Research Foundation and if a patent is granted, he would share the profits with them. The research foundation assumes the risk of legal fees in patent processing, which could cost as much as $20,000.

Coaching football includes filling in as athlete's parent

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

Editor's Note: This is the fourth in a series featuring K-State athletic coaches. The series will run Tuesdays on the sports page.

Stan Parrish claims he has the biggest family in town.

Parrish, K-State's football coach, and his coaching staff are generally regarded as "parents" to more than 100 young men and must be prepared to handle whatever happens.

"Hey, if a kid gets in trouble he isn't going to call the dorm supervisor, he is going to call the coach," Parrish said. "Coaches don't have a clock, and sometimes the coach has to do what the situation demands. We have more control over the kids than anyone else."

As years pass by, Parrish hopes he's remembered by his players as a man who practiced what he preached. Parrish is a disciplinarian — a man who believes the best way to get the most out of oneself is motivation.

Parrish believes his job is to make his players reach for their potential. If he's succesful, he knows the wins and losses will take care of themselves.

"The challenge is when a kid is talented and doesn't have motivation," Parrish said.

"Teaching the not-motivated is a great challenge because they don't feel good about themselves. If a coach has an effect (on) a kid that is unmotivated and can get him to work to his capacity, it will have a positive influence on the team, students and university."

Parrish started his coaching career in the high-school ranks, but his duties as coach at that level differ greatly from his current responsibilities.

The Coaches of K-State

"In high school, you are in a much more structured environment. In college, the parents aren't there, and they can do anything they want. The (college players) need discipline," Parrish said.

Not only is discipline necessary on the field, but discipline is also needed to handle the weight which some fans place on players by making them the figurehead for the entire school.

"The pressures of college athletics are very difficult. That is why the young men need coaches and friends who can help them," Parrish said.

Parrish said he tries to instill self-motivating beliefs in potential recruits.

"The secret is to recruit goal-oriented people who want to do something with themselves," Parrish said. "Proposition 48 (the new National Collegiate Athletic Association rule which raises academic standards for incoming freshmen) is a step in the right direction.

"We will be bringing in kids who have a chance to succeed. Before, the kids who wouldn't have qualified were inferior and didn't have a chance when they began college."

Influenced by those who coached him, becoming a coach quickly became Parrish's dream.

"My coaches have had a tremendous influence on me. Maybe the biggest (influence) that I have learned through them is that honesty is so important. Most of my coaches were role models (to me)," Parrish said.

It's not a huge surprise then that the man who Parrish said had the most influence on his life was a coach. But this particular coach was also his father.

"My dad symbolized all the things that were good," Parrish said. "This helped coaching seem exciting to me."

Haylett earns another admirer

By TONY CARBAJO

Chalk John Capriotti up as the newest Ward Haylett superfan.

Capriotti, the Wildcats' first-year track and cross country boss, presented the track coaching legend with a K-State track uniform and sweat suit Thursday, while bestowing him with the accolade of honorary referee of the Big Eight cross country championships in Manhattan Nov. 1.

In addition, Haylett was earlier named the head of the track booster club established this year to raise funds for the program, which is strapped by financial cutbacks.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Ward Haylett former track coach receives a sweat suit and uniform from track coach John Capriotti. Haylett was recently named head of the K-State track booster club.

"I was totally and completely mesmerized by him," Capriotti said, after meeting Haylett for only the second time.

Haylett started a grand coaching tradition at K-State and was followed by Deloss Dodds and Steve Miller, who have since moved into administrative duties. Capriotti hopes to one day be mentioned in the same breath as his three predecessors.

"You had Haylett, Dodds and Miller," Capriotti said. "All were nationally and world-famous coaches. Someday, I hope I can be in the same group as them."

Capriotti said in the short time he talked to Haylett he could sense equality between their coaching philosophies. Each made the state of Kansas his No. 1 recruiting base.

"I told him I was always going to get the best athletes in Kansas every year and then go elsewhere," Capriotti said. "He agreed totally. He got some great runners from Kansas every year. He was on a very tight budget most of the time and brought in a lot of walk-ons."

After talking to Capriotti, one gets the feeling of having talked to a little-leaguer who met George Brett.

"Here I am just starting out and he has coached for 40 years," Capriotti said.

"He is the track-coaching encyclopedia. Instead of reading the book, you can go talk to Ward Haylett."

Distractions bond Iowa State

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — These are troubled days for Jim Criner's Iowa State football program.

The heavy cloud of NCAA investigation hovers in the air. And some off-the-field incidents have trimmed a few players from the roster, most recently wide receiver Hughes Suffren. It was disclosed prior to Iowa State's game against Indiana State Saturday that Suffren had left the team and not been seen.

"The individuals who have done things off the field, we are not very proud of," Criner said in Monday's telephone press conference with Big Eight coaches.

"Those individuals basically have removed themselves from our football team. They haven't shown up. We haven't seen them around here."

Criner insists the distractions have not been detrimental to his 1-1 team.

"If anything it's pulled us closer together. The football team is really embarrassed about some of the individuals in these incidents."

Oklahoma State suffered a "stinging" loss to Houston Saturday in more ways than one. During the game, Coach Pat Jones noticed star running back Thurman Thomas had an icepack on his lip.

"I thought somebody had hit him in the mouth," Jones said. "Then I heard one of the kids talking about a bee. I asked him about it, and Thurman said a bee flew into the huddle and stung him on the lip. That's kind of the way things are going around here."

Kansas quarterback Mike Orth continues to draw criticism, but Coach Bob Valesente sticks up for him.

In two games, Orth has completed 43 of 83 passes and had four interceptions and no touchdowns.

"There were a lot of good things he did out there but obviously, the bad things stick out," said Kansas Coach Bob Valesente. "But he has made very good progress. He did some excellent things last week and had 3-4 passes dropped. Plus, three of our wide receivers were out of the game."

The quarterback position is one thing Missouri Coach Woody Widenhofer has to cheer about. In the loss to Texas Saturday, sophomore Ronnie Cameron unleashed touchdown runs of 10 and 68 yards and threw a touchdown pass.

"I think our offense can move the ball against just about anybody in the country, especially the way Ronnie Cameron is playing," said Widenhofer.

Is there a better defensive lineman in the nation than Nebraska noseguard Danny Noonan?

"He's the best defensive lineman I've seen around, although I haven't seen everybody," Husker Coach Tom Osborne said.

Briefly In Sports

Soccer team notches two victories

K-State's varsity soccer team remained undefeated by winning a pair of home games against Wichita State and Iowa State at KSU Stadium this weekend.

The Wildcats, 3-0, blanked Wichita State 1-0 Saturday as Victor Atughonu recorded the game's only goal and goalkeeper Akram Al-Ani shut out the Shockers.

In action against Iowa State Sunday, the 'Cats outscored the Cyclones 3-2 as Atughonu, Mark Reuther and Clinton McKenzie each scored.

The only blemish for K-State's soccer program came Sunday as KSU Too, the club's second squad, lost 2-1 to Topeka United. David Ting scored the lone goal for KSU Too, now 1-1.

Koch earns Big 8 defensive honors

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Colorado defensive tackle Curt Koch, a major reason for Colorado's near-upset of Ohio State, was chosen Big Eight defensive player of the week Monday.

Koch had 11 tackles, five unassisted, and four quarterback hurries in Colorado's 13-10 loss to Ohio State. Koch is the first Buffalo to win the award since linebacker Dan McMillen last November.

Koch was selected in a split vote over Missouri kicker Tom Whelihan, who punted five times for a 43.6-yard average and hit two field goals in a 27-25 loss to Texas.

Weekend baseball games cancelled

Home baseball games with Labette County and Pratt this weekend were postponed and will not be made up because of scheduling problems, according to K-State head coach Mike Clark.

Clark said the Wildcats' next outing is set for Sunday against Butler County Community College, a member of the Kansas Jayhawk Juco Conference.

Japan wins medals at Asian Games

SEOUL, South Korea — Resurgent Japan, which started slowly in opening competition of the Asian Games, gained momentum Monday and captured all five swimming races Monday, breaking records in four of them.

Defending champion China finished the third day of competition with 12 gold medals overall to Japan's eight, while host South Korea won its first four gold medals Monday with record-breaking performances on the shooting range.

The 10th Asiad is viewed as a crucial preparation for the 1988 Olympics, for which South Korea will be host.

Worried about terrorist attacks and anti-government activity, the South Koreans have taken what seasoned sports observers say are some of the toughest security measures ever at an international contest. At the pool Monday, German shepherd dogs sniffed the starting blocks before final races began.

The Chinese won both diving and weightlifting events.

Poll ensures encounter between college's elite

By The Associated Press

The 21st meeting between the nation's No. 1 and No. 2 college football teams is on tap for Saturday when Oklahoma visits Miami.

That was assured Monday when the Sooners and Hurricanes remained 1-2 for the third consecutive week in the Associated Press poll.

Oklahoma, 2-0, hammered Minnesota 63-0 last Saturday and received 55 of 59 first-place votes and 1,175 of a possible 1,180 points from a nationwide panel of sports writers and sportscasters.

Miami, 3-0, was idle. The Hurricanes received one first-place ballot and 1,104 points.

Meanwhile, Alabama and Nebraska moved up to the 3-4 spots, while Michigan and Penn State slipped a few places despite victories. Southern California, Maryland and Iowa made the Top Twenty for the first time this season and Notre Dame dropped out, along with Brigham Young, Florida and Georgia.

Alabama defeated Florida 21-7 and moved up from fourth place to third with 1,020 points. Nebraska, a 59-14 winner over Illinois, jumped from sixth to fourth with one first-place vote and 954 points.

Michigan, a 40-point favorite over Oregon State, slipped from third to fifth with 946 points after downing the Beavers 31-19. Washington pounded Brigham Young 52-21 and rose from seventh to sixth with one first-place vote and 903 points.

The remaining first-place ballot went to Penn State, which defeated Boston College 26-14 but fell from fifth to seventh with 878 points.

LSU and Baylor, the 8-9 teams last week, both lost and dropped into the Second Ten. Auburn climbed from 10th to eighth with 722 points after trouncing East Carolina 45-0 and Arkansas went from 12th to ninth with 639 points by defeating Tulsa 34-17.

Rounding out the Top Ten is Arizona, a 41-17 victor over Oregon. The Wildcats, No. 17 a week ago, received 583 points.

Hotline advises callers on AIDS drug

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Since disclosure of the first therapeutic drug to help AIDS sufferers, thousands have called hotlines to get more information, health officials said Monday.

Federal authorities announced Friday that an experimental drug found to cut the death rate and improve quality of life of some AIDS patients would be made more widely available. They stressed, however, that the drug was not a cure, and that it could have serious side effects.

The National Institutes of Health said a special telephone hotline established to answer questions about the drug had received more than 3,500 calls between Friday and Monday.

The hotline, which operates between 8 a.m. EDT and midnight seven days a week, has been receiving an average of 50 calls per hour on 10 incoming lines from doctors and patients interested in being included in further studies of the drug.

Unlike other purported developments involving treatment of acquired immune deficiency syndrome, inquiries about azidothymidine, or ATZ, have not been as frantic as in the past, say operators of the hotline.

A spokesman for the Whitman Walker Clinic here, a clearinghouse for AIDS information, said it has been receiving calls about ATZ, but said these inquiries have not been as urgent as in the past.

"Overall, people have been calm and not flooding us with inquiries, partly because of the hotline established at NIH before the announcement," said Jason Whiddon, coordinator of medical services at the clinic.

"People are keeping up hope, but they are cautious," Whiddon added. "We're talking about people who are already reconciled to the fact that they might die and have had their hopes raised before."

AIDS, an incurable condition caused by a virus that results in destruction of the body's infection-fighting immune system, has been reported in 24,859 Americans to date, 13,689 of whom have died. Until now, there has been no effective treatment for the disease and no one is known to have survived it.

ATZ proved so promising in a controlled human trial that its maker, Burroughs Wellcome Co. of Research Triangle Park, N.C., asked the government to end a trial early for ethical reasons. This would allow people who took part in the study, but who had been taking a dummy drug, or placebo, to begin taking AZT.

The AZT patients suffered fewer deaths and, beginning six weeks after starting the drug, also had noticeably fewer bouts with other infections and cancers associated with AIDS, researchers say.

Federal authorities asked the Food and Drug Administration to speed approval of a new, wider trial that could allow thousands of AIDS patients, with conditions similar to those in the study, to receive the drug in coming weeks and months.

The drug would be available to AIDS sufferers who, within the previous 90 days, had bouts with Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia, a rare form of pneumonia that frequently springs up in AIDS patients, which was the subject of the recently suspended trial.

Scientists met at NIH over the weekend and decided to continue with two ATZ trials using placebos, which they say is necessary to assess how well a drug is working, said one official.

United Way begins drive, sets $70,000 campus goal

By The Collegian Staff

The United Way kicked off its campus campaign Monday with a $70,000 goal and the help of an 8-foot Willie the Wildcat.

This is the first year the organization has had an actual goal for the campus and the first Willie the Wildcat goal board, which is going to be painted purple as the goal is reached.

Roberta Flaherty, chairwoman of the Campus United Way Committee, said 119 students, faculty and staff have volunteered.

The 16 United Way agencies provide a number of services for the community.

United Way agencies include the American Red Cross of Riley County, the Armed Services YMCA, Big Brothers/Big Sisters of Manhattan, the Crisis Center, the Coronado Council of Boy Scouts, the Flint Hills Breadbasket, the Home Health Service, the Kaw Valley Girl Scout Council, Kansas Children's Service League, the Manhattan Day Care Center, the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, the Retired Senior Volunteer Program, the Salvation Army, Teen Outreach, the United Cerebral Palsy and the Volunteer Clearing House.

A Riley County run this week will begin the campaign in four other cities.

"The United Way still needs more help," Flaherty said. She said the organization is looking for a student group to set up an information table in the Union and help with fund-raising activities.

Flaherty said she knew of some organizations that use as much as 50 percent of their funds for administrative costs, but only 11 percent of United Way funds go to administrative costs.

"All the United Way agencies are working on bare bone budgets. We have a board that goes through a tight budgeting procedure," Flaherty said.

She said the workers employed at the various agencies have had to cut down drastically.

Fort Riley program coordinates aviation assets

By BOB OLSON
Staff Writer

After nearly two years of construction at Fort Riley, what has been hailed by many as the home of a new aviation battalion is complete.

In reality, the construction is being done to consolidate existing aviation assets from all over Fort Riley, said Paul Stone, media relations specialist with the Fort Riley Public Affairs Office. Several buildings, hangars and a new water tower are being built adjacent to Interstate 70, and across the landing strip from what has, until now, been known as the 1st Aviation Battalion.

The move is part of the Army's Force Modernization Program. Fort Riley will eventually get the new UH-60 utility helicopter, which will replace the familiar UH-1 Huey, which saw a lot of service in Vietnam, Stone said.

The Huey utility helicopter is now used for commuting, courier service and traffic control in metropolitan areas. It is also used extensively by ranchers to patrol their herds, he said.

"Army aviation has undergone many changes over the past 40 years," said Maj. Gen. Leonard P. Wishart III, commanding general of the 1st Infantry Division (Mechanized) and Fort Riley. Wishart spoke at the activation ceremony for the new 1st Aviation Brigade at Fort Riley on Sept. 3.

"It has grown from a fledgling start, following the creation of the Air Force as a separate service, to become an integral member of the combat arms and combined arms team," he said. Combined arms team refers collectively to all of the military services.

"The Army is going through a major transition in doctrine, organization, equipment and training," Wishart said.

The new brigade consists of Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 1st Aviation Brigade; 1st Squadron, 4th Cavalry; 1st Attack Helicopter Battalion, formerly Company D, 1st Aviation Battalion; 134th Assault Helicopter Company, formerly Company C, 1st Aviation Battalion; 82nd Medical Detachment (Helicopter Ambulance); and 3rd Platoon, 68th Air Traffic Control Company.

bargo issue. So the only thing we can figure out is that for a guy who says he stands where he says he stands, he certainly isn't standing very firm.

"He is trying to divert attention from a pattern of continual flipflops on issues in his 14 years of service to this state, and we will begin talking about that very soon."

Hayden conceded during his news conference he should have made his position more clear immediately after the joint appearance he made with Docking before agricultural reporters at Manhattan nearly a month ago.

He has denied repeatedly since it became an issue in the campaign for governor in the Nov. 4 election that he singled out a ban on wheat sales as the only sanction the U.S. ought to impose on South Africa.

However, he told newsmen, he didn't do it quickly or expansively enough and his supporters throughout the state have urged him to make a stronger statement.

"Others say, 'Mike, we don't know what your silence means ... we don't know how to interpret your silence.'"

Hayden also said he was slow to react to Docking's capitalization on the grain embargo issue because. "I'm not used to people taking the low road as my opponent has done."

Asked if he wished he had clarified his Manhattan statement more quickly, Hayden replied:

"Yes, that was my mistake. I'm blunt, and I answered the question the way it was asked about grain sales. I should have said my position involved total sanctions.

"I guess I thought people would understand it was part of an over-all proposal. I should have clarified it."

Kelley Hayden, the candidate's brother and press secretary, was the first in his campaign to say publicly that Mike Hayden meant in his Manhattan comments to relate the ban on wheat sales to a total package of economic sanctions against South Africa. But that didn't come until last week, after Docking had begun running his radio and TV ads.

Hayden declined to respond directly when reporters asked him if the grain embargo issue was hurting him badly.

Instead, he said he was not surprised because, "I expect to be the object of attacks from (the Docking campaign)," and that he has "faith in the voters of this state" that they will understand his position.

"My personal belief is that appropriate action should be taken to stop the destruction of human dignity in South Africa," Hayden said.

Slattery

Slattery, who is seeking re-election for his 2nd District seat in the November general election, was surprised to learn from corps officials that contractors at the base pick their own inspectors to OK their projects.

"That concept doesn't make sense," he said. "That's like the monkey guarding the banana boat."

The congressman also viewed a petroleum storage depot partly constructed of South African steel.

Bob Moody, president of the Riley-Geary County Building Trade Council, said only 10 percent of domestic projects may be constructed with foreign materials.

Slattery also visited a site where a pipe was constructed using $250 valves. Moody said specifications allegedly called for higher quality valves worth $1,700 each.

He said the corps would provide him with information about the valves and the amount of foreign-made materials used in the storage depot.

Richter

"K-State has connections with Pakistan of various sorts," he said. The University hosted a lecture by Rasul Palijo, opposition leader with the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy in Pakistan, on Sept. 10.

"The political situation in Pakistan has been a little bit in flux. Bhutto led a protest against the government in August. That has apparently subsided now," he said. "But it is an uncertain situation. There will be more political disruption in the future."

Richter said he will be discussing domestic political issues. Stephen Cohen, professor of political science at the University of Illinois, who is currently on a two-year assignment with the policy planning staff of the State Department, will discuss military and security issues.

Phillip Jones, who is with a private consulting firm in Washington, D.C., and was formerly a South Asia specialist with the government, will speak about the domestic economic situation.

Finally, Thomas Thornton, formerly a member of the Carter administration who is now involved with the Center for Strategic and International Studies at Georgetown, will present an overview of U.S.-Soviet relations.

"Pakistan is a country that has never had a very stable political system," Richter said. "More often, governments change by public protest and military intervention. People, when they get power, don't leave voluntarily, and consequently there is a long history of political instability and violence.

"There have been several attempts to rise above that tradition.... The present government has a chance."

last week from Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev. "For the moment, let me simply say we are giving it serious and careful consideration."

As for the Aug. 30 arrest of Daniloff and his subsequent indictment, Reagan was stern:

"Let me, in the tradition of candor established at Geneva, tell you that a pall has been cast over our relations with the Soviet Union."

He called the Daniloff case "a particularly disturbing example of Soviet transgressions against human rights."

Reagan said the Soviets had made Daniloff, 51, "the subject of fabricated accusations and trumped-up charges." He said the reporter was arrested and jailed "in a callous disregard of due process and numerous human rights conventions."

S. African miners cause disruption during company memorial service

By The Associated Press

EVANDER, South Africa — About 200 black miners, shouting union slogans and tribal chants, disrupted a company-sponsored memorial service Monday for 177 men killed in a mine fire last week.

"We're not going to pray with whites today. We've never been allowed to pray with whites. We'll have our own rites," miners shouted.

Holding clubs and steel rods over their heads, they ran through the outdoor service 10 times, drowning out sermons by white and black preachers. Hundreds of other workers who came for the service poured out of bleachers and chairs to join the dissidents.

After the service, they continued to race around a field near the No. 2 shaft of Kinross gold mine until officials from the National Union of Mineworkers calmed them down.

A fire in the shaft last Tuesday killed 172 black and 5 white miners, and injured 235, mostly blacks.

Regional union organizer Tshidiso Mothupi said the union would hold its own memorial Wednesday at nearby Secunda.

In Johannesburg, the United Democratic Front, South Africa's main multiracial anti-apartheid alliance, said in a statement it joined trade unions in holding the mine owners "fully responsible for this tragic loss of 177 precious lives, lives that have made possible the millions in riches that the mining bosses have today."

About 6,000 Kinross miners attended the outdoor memorial service Monday. In the front row was Derek Keys, chairman of General Mining Union Corp., and other white managers.

The miners' signs and slogans reflected racial tension in the mines, where blacks work under white supervision, and accusations that company neglect of safety procedures contributed to the disaster.

Legislature upholds tax exemption

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan has upheld constitutionality of a law passed by the 1986 Legislature which exempts from property taxes farm machinery and equipment which is held in inventory after it has been taxed one time.

Stephan also gave his qualified approval to another portion of the same law which exempts from taxation those hand tools exclusively used by a mechanic on the construction or repair of machinery. However, he called that exemption "somewhat suspect."

When the Legislature declared the public purpose of the exemption of farm machinery and equipment from the inventory tax was to benefit agriculture and the Kansas economy, it gave that exemption legitimacy, Stephan said in a legal opinion dated last Wednesday but not made public until Monday.

Exempting farm machinery and equipment from property taxes, Stephan said, doesn't violate the requirement of the Kansas Constitution that taxes be assessed in this state on a "uniform and equal" basis.

The new law requires that farm machinery and equipment be listed on the tax rolls the first year a merchant takes it into his inventory. However, in the second year and all years after that, if the equipment is not sold, it is not taxed.

The public purpose declared by the Legislature noted the importance of agriculture to the state's economy and added, "It is a benefit to agriculture and the economy of the state generally to preserve readily available and affordable farm machinery and equipment within the farming communities of this state."

Star Wars

warheads is the release of a number of "dummies" that look the same as the warheads on radar. To be effective, SDI would have to discriminate between the real thing and the dummies, Donnert said.

"The idea is to kill about 90 percent of the enemy missiles in the boost/post-boost phases, then, of those that get through, (kill) another 90 percent in mid-course," Donnert said. "With whatever is left over, you go to terminal defense where you intercept the missile and kill the son of a gun."

Another misconception Compaan discussed was that the United States has a "missile gap" giving Russia first strike capability. He said it is important to realize the deterrent forces of the two countries are constructed differently.

The Soviet Union has most of its delivery capability in Inter Continental Ballistic Missiles whereas that of the United States is small. SDI would be designed to detect ICBM's.

Donnert said the United States could surrender, take the blow, or negotiate if the Soviet Union launched a first strike. He said the United States should launch a retaliatory strike at the first indication of the Soviet Union making the first move.

Compaan said another misconception is that SDI would slow the arms race because it is a defensive system. Compaan said Star Wars would probably not lead to a halt in the arms race. The history of the arms race shows that when any action has been taken by one side, the other side also acts, he said.

Bids on coliseum fall under budget

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

The second round of bids on the Fred Bramlage Coliseum taken Tuesday in Topeka were more than $1.3 million under the construction budget, paving the way for an Oct. 18 groundbreaking.

Separate general, electrical and mechanical contracting bids submitted totalled $14,535,249. The figure is $1,387,751 below the construction budget of $15,923,000.

"Today marks the culmination of an enterprise that many people worked long and hard for many years to achieve," said Charles Hein, acting director of the coliseum. "This ranks as a special day in the history of the University."

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said, "There is one word that I can think of that best describes today's bidding — Hallelujah! We finally got it."

When the coliseum project was originally bid on in August 1985, the low bid was $3.4 million above the estimated budget. Gossen Livingston Associates of Wichita, architects for the coliseum, were authorized to redesign the structure, and on Friday, the Kansas Board of Regents approved plans for the coliseum.

Six firms submitted general contracting base bids. J.E. Dunn, Kansas City, Mo., submitted the apparent low bid of $10,990,000. Three firms submitted electrical base bids, with Linder & Associates Electrical Contractors, Wichita, submitting the apparent low bid of $1,102,000. Two firms submitted mechanical base bids, and the apparent low bidder was Young's Inc., Topeka, at $2,443,249.

Miller said the University will be reviewing the bids today, and it will take two to three weeks to draw up contracts for the project, which will be extended to the low bidders. Low bidders are to be confirmed Thursday.

"We want to move as fast as we can so the contractors can get their supplies ordered," Miller said.

Hein said that because the bids came in under budget, the University has the option to add features to the coliseum. In order of preference, options include a south annex, a north annex, a fluted block wall, 48-foot stage curtains, concrete aprons for east and west parking areas, flagpoles with lights and retractable seating.

"The fact that the bids came in under budget gives us a chance to have a complete facility without additional fund raising," Miller said. "Or, we can concentrate on other developments, such as expanding sidewalks or improving parking."

Miller credited former University President Duane Acker for his involvement with the coliseum.

"A certain amount of credit has to go to Duane Acker for staying with this project. He showed great perseverance in terms of believing in the project and believing it was in the best interests of the University," Miller said.

"The coliseum is going to be a facility we can all be proud of," he said. "It will be a good place for events that will pull people together."

Completion of the coliseum is scheduled for Oct. 15, 1988.

"Two years from now, we'll realize how significant the structure is going to be to the campus," Miller said.

Hein said the groundbreaking, scheduled for 10 a.m. on Oct. 18 on the site directly south of KSU Stadium, will precede the K-State-University of Kansas football game, which begins at 11:40 a.m.

"This will be a great day for Kansas State," Hein said.

Task Force takes new look at fee

By The Collegian Staff

The Athletic Fee Task Force took a step back Tuesday by deciding to investigate the need for an athletic fee.

Last week the committee discussed the possible uses and control over a possible athletic fee assessed to students.

Tuesday the meeting opened with concerns over whether the committee had already made a decision about the fee assessment.

"Maybe we should back up and find out what we're doing here," said Bill Majerus, task force member and graduate in agronomy.

Discussing the information presented to the task force so far, Majerus said, "We've only looked at a budget under audit and one that's proposed, and that's pretty shaky."

Information already presented to the group includes budget figures for 1985 and 1986 provided by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

In answer to questions raised concerning the purpose of the task force, Chairman Doug Folk, junior in electrical engineering, said its job was to research the feasibility of the athletic fee.

"Sally (Traeger, Student Senate chairwoman and senior in marketing) told me she wanted us (the task force) to come up with something to vote on," Folk said.

When contacted Tuesday night, Traeger said the task force was "designed to be an information gathering group."

The group would "have to be a judge (as to) whether there is a need (for the fee)," she said.

The group is charged with gathering information and presenting a recommendation to the Student Senate, Traeger said.

"The recommendation is not carved in stone," she said, referring to the fact that any action on a fee assessment would have to go through the Senate no matter what the task force recommends.

Steve Ligon, task force member and senior in animal science and industry, disagreed.

"I don't see the use of a proposal if we're going to fight against it (the athletic fee)," he said. "We don't even know if there is a need for it yet."

States receive approval to increase speed limit

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted Tuesday to allow state legislatures to raise the speed limit on rural portions of the interstate system to 65 mph, bowing to complaints from westerners that the current ceiling is unrealistic.

"If easterners don't want to drive in the West, they don't have to," Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, declared before the Senate first refused to kill the plan on a 40-57 vote and then voted 56-36 to attach it to a $52.3 billion highway authorization bill.

The provision applies to rural portions of the interstate system throughout the country.

The Senate also rejected a move to extend the plan to rural primary and secondary roads, which under the measure approved by the lawmakers would remain at its current level.

Despite the Senate's action, prospects remained doubtful for final action to roll back the unpopular limit by the target date of Oct. 3 for congressional adjournment.

Numerous differences remain to be ironed out between the Senate version of the highway program and that of the House, and one of them is the 55 mph speed limit.

A proposed five-year test period for a 65 mph speed limit on rural interstates fell short of approval 198-218 in the House on Aug. 8.

Proponents of the current, 55 mph national maximum speed limit, which was enacted in 1974 as an energy-saving measure amid a gasoline shortage, said that raising it by even 10 mph was guaranteed to cost lives.

"If we do this, we will be, in effect, signing the death warrants of 500 men, women and children a year and, in effect, we will be accessories to the maiming of thousands of others," Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., declared.

The measures would enable state legislatures to increase the limit on rural interstate highways but would leave the top speed on other roads at its current level.

Students find ideas at Career Day

By The Collegian Staff

About 1,500 students took a closer look into the business industry during the fifth annual Business Career Day Tuesday in the Union Ballroom.

Representatives from 34 business companies informed students about what employers are looking for in prospective employees.

"We are trying to give the students at K-State an opportunity to take a look at the different employers and vice versa," said Rob Siegfried, career day coordinator and senior in marketing. "Each company sets up its own table, and provides their own informational tools, such as visual aides, literature, freebies, films, posters and handouts."

Both students and representatives of the companies try to use this day to their advantage. The firms take the opportunity to get to know the students and look for potential employees. If a student is interested in one of the companies, meeting with the representative could serve as an icebreaker for an interview or perhaps a "foot-in-the-door," Siegfried said.

"A lot of students attend to see if there is a certain company they want to work for," he said. "By asking questions, they find out if their special skills and interests can be utilized. It's a big informational setting."

The day takes a lot of planning to be organized and successful, Siegfried said.

"We started planning it this last spring, but most of the work was done over the summer and the very beginning of the school year," he said. "It was certainly a success, and I'm sure everyone believes it was well worth the work."

Sandy Warmund, a former K-State student and Business Career Day coordinator, returned to this year's conference to give a speech on "Investment for the Common Man" at one of the career seminars. Warmund now works for First Investments Corp.

Business Career Day is sponsored by the College of Business Administration and the Marketing Club. Each of the companies paid a registration fee to help with the cost of the event.

Summit remains 'realistic possibility,' Soviet minister says

By The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze accused President Reagan Tuesday of harboring "evil designs" for a first strike with the Star Wars system, but he said a "realistic possibility" still existed for a superpower summit.

In an address to the 41st General Assembly, Shevardnadze called President Reagan's U.N. address of Monday "regrettable" and "propagandistic."

He mixed conciliation with an attack on U.S. strategic arms policies.

"Whatever is done to conceal it, the so-called defensive space shield is being developed for a first strike," Shevardnadze said.

"Evil designs are being passed for good intentions, and a sword for a shield." he said.

Before his speech, the Soviet foreign minister had an unscheduled 45-minute meeting with Secretary of State George P. Shultz, apparently to discuss the confinement of American reporter Nicholas S. Daniloff in Moscow on spy charges.

Neither side issued a statement afterward.

Shevardnadze did not mention Daniloff in his speech, but the Soviets have been saying without elaboration that Daniloff, Moscow correspondent for U.S. News & World Report magazine, could be freed "very rapidly" if the U.S. administration took the right course.

Shevardnadze addressed the General Assembly on the second day of its so-called "general debate," an annual event which gives heads of state and government, foreign ministers and other officials of the 159-member world body a chance to deliver policy statements for their governments. Tuesday's speakers included British Foreign Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe and Japanese Foreign Minister Tadashi Kuranari. Both expressed the hope for another superpower summit this year.

Striking a conciliatory note, Shevardnadze said in his address:

"Lately, encouraging outlines of meaningful agreements have been emerging. A summit meeting is also a realistic possibility. We could move forward rather smoothly, if that is what the U.S. side wants."

Shevardnadze urged Washington to follow up its words about reducing the threat of nuclear war "with practical deeds."

"I am authorized to state that the Soviet Union is prepared to sign at any time and in any place a treaty on a total prohibition of nuclear weapons tests," he said.

Shultz sat grim-faced through Shevardnadze's speech. He later told reporters he welcomed the Soviet proposal for eliminating nuclear weapons, "something President Reagan has long advocated."

Even more welcome, Shultz said, would be "practical steps" by the Soviets at Geneva arms talks to "join us in the radical reductions we've proposed there."

In his 37-minute speech Monday, Reagan mentioned his original proposal for a mutual 50 percent cutback in strategic bombers, submarines and missiles.

Last week, the president showed he was willing to settle for less. He authorized his arms negotiator, Ambassador Max M. Kampelman to explore in Geneva the possibility of a more moderate cutback of 30 percent by each side.

The compromise was suggested after Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev objected to sharper cuts, which would have forced abandoning many of the heavy, land-based missiles that are the core of the Soviet nuclear arsenal.

Shevardnadze countered Reagan criticism of Soviet foreign policies by attacking U.S. policies in North Africa, Central America and elsewhere.

He said the U.S. administration was "raising the stick of 'neoglobalism over the Mediterranean" and had used it "with barbaric cruelty in Libya."

Of Nicaragua, Shevardnadze said "millions of dollars are being channeled to finance the massacres of peasants and the destruction of villages and plantations."

Paris bombings claim 9th fatality

PARIS — A policemen has died of wounds suffered last week when a bomb exploded as he was helping remove it from a crowded cafe, it was announced Tuesday. He was the ninth person to die in a series of bombings linked to Middle Eastern terorists.

In newspaper interviews published here, Lebanese President Amin Gemayel said nations which support terrorism should be denounced by name, while Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Sharaa said his country was disturbed by reports linking it to the terror campaign in Paris.

The interviews appeared in the newspaper Le Monde and coincided with the announcement that Bertrand Gauthier, a 29-year-old policeman, died Monday night from wounds. Another policeman died in the same bomb blast.

Five attacks over a 10-day period beginning Sept. 8 killed nine people and injured 163. The last bombing was Sept. 17 at the Tai discount clothing store, where five died and 52 were injured.

Couple requests drug rehabilitation

SANTA ANA, Calif. — A couple turned in for alleged drug abuse by their teen-age daughter pleaded innocent Tuesday to charges of possessing narcotics and requested placement in a drug program.

Deputy District Attorney James J. Mulgrew recommended that the charges be dropped if the couple complete such a program.

Orange County Municipal Court Judge Manuel Ramirez ordered Bobby Dale Young, 49, and his wife, Judith Ann, 37, to return to court Nov. 6 for a decision on their request. He turned the case over to the Probation Department for a recommendation on whether they qualify for the program.

On Aug. 13, the Youngs' only child, Deanna, 13, went to Tustin police with a trash bag which authorities said contained $2,800 worth of cocaine plus marijuana, pills and assorted paraphernalia.

Bill favors no retirement age law

WASHINGTON — The House on Tuesday passed a bill eliminating mandatory retirement at any age and requiring continued health coverage by employers for workers age 70 and above.

Under the measure, passed 394-0, most employees would no longer have to retire at age 70. However, states and local governments would still be able to set mandatory retirement ages for firefighters and police.

Rep. Claude Pepper, D-Fla., at 86 the oldest member of Congress, said the overall bill was an important step toward ending age discrimination.

Killer of 2 runs loose in Missouri

WRIGHT CITY, Mo. — Normally the door is open at the 50's Cafe, a 24-hour restaurant and pool hall. But Tuesday was different.

A killer was on the loose, and to frightened residents, every stranger seemed suspicious.

"If I don't know you, you don't get in the door," said Mary Van Pelt, 35, who was nervously smoking cigarettes as she stood behind the counter of the restaurant.

Van Pelt and the rest of this small town were hoping anxiously that Michael W. Jackson would be captured. Jackson, 41, was suspected of killing two people Monday morning in Indianapolis and going on a rampage of abductions and car thefts as he moved across Indiana and Illinois into eastern Missouri. Authorities said Tuesday that Jackson may be linked to a homicide that occurred Monday night in Missouri.

Turnpike to lower gasoline prices

WICHITA — The Kansas Turnpike Authority is planning to bring gasoline prices at service areas down to off-turnpike levels under a new contract that goes into effect Oct. 27, a spokeswoman said Tuesday.

In the past, gasoline retailers for the turnpike were selected based on the highest bid to rent the six KTA-owned facilities. Fuel prices were higher than those at nearby off-turnpike stations.

Under new guidelines, KTA will award the contract to the company that guarantees the lowest prices to motorists. The retailer will be required to sell at a price equal to or less than a fixed margin above the published wholesale price for the region.

Pester Marketing Co. of El Dorado is the apparent low bidder at all six locations, KTA spokeswoman Lisa Callahan said. The contract will be considered at a future KTA meeting, she said.

5 air controllers found using drugs

OLATHE — Five air traffic controllers were put on administrative leave for using marijuana and cocaine while off-duty, the Federal Aviation Administration said Tuesday.

The FAA put 36 of its controllers at the Kansas City Air Route Traffic Control Center on administrative leave in all. Twenty-eight were cleared in an investigation which included testing urine samples and were returned to duty.

Three remained on leave while the investigation continued, said Felton Lancaster, manager of the Kansas City center.

The five found to have used illegal drugs were offered the opportunity to undergo counseling and rehabilitation in an FAA program, according to a statement released by Lancaster.

"These (36) employees were not allowed to control traffic in accordance with the FAA's policy regarding allegations of illegal drug use or alcohol abuse," Lancaster said.

Due to a reporter's error, Hermann Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering, and Alvin Compaan, professor of physics, were incorrectly identified in Monday's Collegian.

Due to an editing error, the College of Agriculture was omitted in the article, "USDA officials train in unique curriculum," as a participant in the training program for food technologists.

K-State grad researches ovarian cancer

Isolates human gene, MIS, for studies

By BARRY STEFFEN
Collegian Reporter

Richard Cate, a 1979 graduate of K-State, is making important steps toward discovering a new weapon against ovarian cancer.

The weapon is Mullerian Inhibiting Substance, which is of central importance in the proper development of the reproductive system in males, said Thomas Roche, professor of biochemistry. The primary role of MIS is to retard the development of female reproductive organs in a male fetus.

"The substance will be useful for curing certain types of cancers that occur in the female reproductive system," Roche said.

Cate, in a telephone interview from Biogen Inc. in Cambridge, Mass., said the idea behind using MIS as a preventive tool against cancer is that if MIS blocks the growth of female fetal structures in males, then possibly it will also block the growth of tumors in these organs in females.

Cate said his colleague, Dr. Patricia Donahoe, pediatric surgeon at Massachusetts General Hospital, originated the hypothesis for MIS in 1979.

"She developed the initial interest," Roche said. "Rich (Cate) is the person responsible for the whole process of selection and cloning of the human gene coding for MIS."

A primary problem with MIS was that it could not be produced in quantities large enough to be effective in experimentation. Through a variety of techniques involving genetic engineering, Cate was able to transfer the gene to a bacterium that could be used to manufacture MIS in large quantities, Roche said.

"I isolated the human gene for MIS," Cate said, "and then put it back into a cell where we could grow it in a laboratory."

Cate said that at this point he can isolate sufficient amounts of human MIS to test tumors. But he is just beginning to initiate tests to increase the level of MIS made in cells. He said he also has worked out a purification procedure to separate MIS protein from all other proteins found in a cell.

In the past, experiments have been done on removed human tumors, with the MIS taken from cattle. Cate said that in 25 of 28 cases the growths were inhibited.

He said a bovine substance could never be tested on humans because the Food and Drug Administration prohibits the use of a cross-species protein application.

Cate said there are plans to begin testing animals with human MIS in one or two months.

"I believe it will be a while before we see the results and effects on animals," Roche said, "So, I'm sure it will also be a while before humans can be tested."

Cate said the FDA requires extensive testing in animals before human tests can be run, and it would be at least another two years.

The American Cancer Society reports that ovarian cancer is the fourth leading cause of death among American women. The cancer claims 10,000 lives a year and kills 70 percent of its victims within two to three years of diagnosis.

The journal Cell reported MIS might also be useful as a birth control drug.

The Boston Globe reported that Donahoe said the idea was purely speculative, and the theory was based on the belief that adult women in their reproductive years produce MIS, which blocks cell division in maturing egg cells.

Cate is a senior research scientist at Biogen. He earned his Ph.D. in biochemistry at K-State and after graduation worked with Nobel Prize winner Walter Gilbert at Harvard University.

Roche, a professor of Cate's, said he also has participated in the cloning of several other gene proteins, including Liprociton and Factor VIII.

Liprociton is a protein that causes anti-inflamatory activity in the body. Factor VIII is a protein that contributes to blood clotting and is often the missing blood-clotting factor in hemophiliacs.

Officials to take part in annual ranch tour

By The Collegian Staff

Gov. John Carlin and a number of other officials from the Kansas Senate and the House of Representatives will be among the estimated 300 people participating Thursday in the annual Governor's Farm and Ranch Field Day.

The tour, which is in its 12th year, is sponsored by Kansas Farm Bureau. Scheduled stops include farming operations in Riley, Geary and Clay counties. This is the first time a tour has been given in the Riley County area, said Gordon Hibbard, director of communications at KFB.

"The tour is to provide an opportunity for state chief executives to see the actual farms," Hibbard said. The tour also provides farmers the chance to talk one-on-one with the governor about agriculture.

"Carlin will be able to see diversified industries that diversify the economy," he said.

Farmers, ranchers and other county leaders will be in attendance for a full day of touring scheduled to begin at 8:30 a.m. from Manhattan's Holidome and ending with a dinner at 7 p.m. at the Clay Center National Guard Armory.

The governor's tour will include stops at River Creek Farms and Britts Garden Acres in Manhattan, Otto Roesler Dairy Farm and Merle and Keith Ascher Farm in Junction City.

Tour participants will stop for lunch at the Geary County 4-H and Senior Citizens Center in Junction City, at which time Carlin and KFB President Doyle Rahjes will speak to the group.

The tour will continue to Gilbert Grain, Key Milling and the Elks Lodge in Clay Center and end at the National Guard Armory.

This year's field day is the eighth tour that Gov. Carlin has attended since his election in 1978.

Space center to memorialize astronauts

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The families of four Challenger astronauts, appearing together publicly for the first time in months, told a group of school children Tuesday of their plans to create a national space science education center.

"We have lost the Challenger, but we haven't lost the challenge of keeping those dreams alive," June Scobee told about 20 students at the Stevens Elementary School.

Scobee, 44, the widow of Dick Scobee, commander of the space shuttle that blew up after take-off on Jan. 28, said the Challenger families have formed a non-profit foundation to help pay for a space science education center in Washington.

The families, she said, believe that an educational center is a "living tribute" that is "more appropriate than a memorial of brick and mortar."

Steven McAuliffe, the widower of teacher Christa McAuliffe, said his wife and the other dead astronauts would not have wanted some granite memorial. Instead, the families selected a project that reflected the ideals and hopes of their loved ones, he said.

McAuliffe, a science teacher from Concord, N.H., had planned to give lessons, by television, to students around the nation from the spacecraft. She was the first teacher selected by NASA.

Also present at Stevens were Marcia Jarvis, the widow of Gregory Jarvis, a payload specialist on the Challenger, and Charles Resnik, the brother of astronaut Judy Resnik.

Jane Smith, Cheryl McNair, and Lorna Onizuka, the widows of three other astronauts, did not attend the event because of airline schedules.

McAuliffe, a lawyer, said his two children, ages 10 and 7, are doing well in school, even though "they felt terrible, they felt terrible" after the shuttle disaster.

But he said, "The world is the way it is, not the way we wished it had been. That's the way it went, and now the challenge is to make the best of it."

Committee's fighting makes Johnson resign

The resignation of Student Body President Steven Johnson as chairman of the Student Advisory Committee to the Kansas Board of Regents was the best thing he could do to prevent a bad situation from becoming worse.

Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, resigned the position late last week after being asked to step down. He alleged that other committee members had actively worked against him since he assumed the chairmanship in March.

David Epstein, student body president at the University of Kansas, said Johnson couldn't handle the responsibility and the request that Johnson step down was not a personal attack.

While the explanations of Johnson's resignation differ between Johnson and Epstein, it doesn't matter whose view is more accurate because the group simply could not work together. The members competed with each other until it became a nonproductive power struggle.

Realizing the level to which the committee had degenerated, Johnson faced two choices: either fruitlessly continue to fight with the other members or help alleviate the situation by stepping down.

His choice to do the latter is commendable.

This whole episode was disappointing for two reasons. First, Johnson — for whatever reasons — relinquished a position few students can obtain. Having the K-State student body president as chairman of the committee was a plus for the University.

Second, it's sad that such an influential and important student group chose to preoccupy itself with childish accusations and petty bickering. The committee should concentrate on its purpose — acting on behalf of students.

European agreement may encourage peace

After 33 months of deliberation, 35 European nations signed an agreement Sunday in Stockholm, Sweden, that sets a precedent for peace. The agreement should provide initiative for the United States and Soviet Union to pursue negotiations.

It was the first time the Soviet Union agreed to allow on-site inpections of military maneuvers on Soviet soil.

The agreement takes measures to reduce the risk of accidental war in Europe by stipulating that members of NATO must notify members of the Warsaw Pact at least 42 days before beginning military maneuvers involving at least 13,000 soldiers and 300 tanks.

The Warsaw Pact countries must likewise notify NATO countries when planning similar military activities.

If one of the 35 nations suspects another is conducting maneuvers on a large scale, it can demand an on-site inspection using aircraft or land vehicles as long as the request is made within 24 hours of the reported violation.

Each Nov. 15, participating nations must provide a schedule of all planned military activities involving 40,000 or more troops for the next two-year period. Each nation would also be required to allow three on-site inspections annually.

Officials worldwide hailed the agreement as evidence of new communication and understanding between the East and West.

Soviet delegate to the conference, Oleg Grinevsky, said given the current world situation, the agreement was a great step forward and he was sorry the Soviet Union couldn't do more.

However, the Soviet Union wasn't trying to do more.

Prior to signing the agreement, the Warsaw Pact nations and the NATO pact nations disagreed on the size of maneuvers that would require notification. The Warsaw Pact nations wanted to allow a larger number of troops making maneuvers before notification is mandatory than did the NATO nations.

Although the smaller NATO number was not accepted, the agreement is a positive step toward ensuring peace in Europe. The United States and the Soviet Union should take the agreement as a cue to resolve further differences.

Lack of lights causes danger in parking lot

A transformer in the Union parking lot last week was struck by lightning and destroyed.

The administration cannot be held accountable for this act of nature. However, it should have taken responsibility for equipping the lot with a temporary lighting source.

While lighting was out, students, faculty and staff entered a black hole each time they approached the Union parking lot after about 8 p.m. Medians throughout the lot were almost impossible to see and car colors were indistinguishable. The possibility of rape and robbery increased immensely in the unexposed area and chances of vehicles hitting pedestrians or other cars were imminent.

Charles Beckom, K-State Police captain, said police surveillance of the parking lot was increased during the week, but how much could the officers have seen with a single flashlight?

The replacement transformer was installed Tuesday, but the possibility of another lighting problem anywhere on campus is always present. A temporary lighting generator should be obtained and stored for future lighting failures. Safety should be reason enough for this precaution.

Denison crosswalk needs stoplight

JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

In a 15-minute period last spring, more than 300 motor vehicles zoomed through the intersection of College Heights Road and Denison Avenue, forcing 140 students to play dodge-car.

A traffic and pedestrian flow count was conducted April 9 by the Student Senate standing committee, Student Affairs & Social Services, to establish need for a traffic signal on "death row."

For a signal to be warranted, 600 or more vehicles on the major street, Denison in this case, and 150 or more pedestrians must enter the intersection every hour, eight hours a day, City Engineer Jerry Petty said.

The Student Senate count showed sufficient vehicle and pedestrian traffic to warrant a stoplight. The city commissioners, who will decide if the signal should be installed, cannot accept figures from private citizens. Therefore, Petty's staff completed a similar study.

Petty said his study showed the intersection to be a borderline case, with seven hours of traffic of more than 600 cars per hour and a maximum of 567 automobiles an hour the rest of the period. He assumed Student Senate figures for pedestrians were correct and didn't recount them in his study.

Petty said he conducted the study in one 24-hour period and will follow with a longer survey early in October to determine an average of hourly traffic.

Unfortunately, even if Petty does find justification, the chances of getting a signal are slim.

The light would be added to the 1988 capital improvement six-year program, said James Pearson, assistant city manager. It would be added to a list of already established capital improvements in order of priority. These include at least three other intersection signals. traffic signs, sewer repairs and other improvements. Priority is based on need and funds available. The signal will cost about $70,000 and Pearson said without partial funding by the University, it could be a long wait before we see a signal flashing between College Heights and Denison.

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, said he's not sure if state money given to the University could be used toward a traffic signal on a non-University street. He also said other projects requiring state funds would be in competition for the money.

To make matters worse, items in the capital improvements plan are given new priority each year. Additions and repairs included in the 1988-93 plan could be pushed back every year, even past 1993.

An alternative for the intersection would be a four-way stop. There are already stop signs on College Heights, but Petty said adding signs to Denison "just wouldn't be the right thing to do." He explained Denison serves as an arterial street and a stop sign would impede on the relatively continuous traffic flow.

Well then, how about painting the intersection with white lines and installing crosswalk signs on Denison?

No dice. Petty said studies conducted on California pedestrian crosswalks showed more accidents occurred at intersections with lines than at those without lines. People tend to feel a false sense of security when walking in a designated crosswalk and, therefore, don't pay attention to oncoming cars, he explained. White lines at mid-block locations are necessary because there is not a street crossing to form an intersection, he said.

If we can't have a stoplight and we can't have a painted crosswalk, maybe we could just reduce the 30 mph speed limit on Denison to 20 mph. This would surely slow those fiendish drivers who relish in accelerating through the pedestrian-filled intersection, forcing them to dash back to the curb.

Alas, even changing the speed limit is impossible. Denison and College Heights go through residential areas where the speed limit is set by law. The city doesn't have the authority to lower the speed unless the streets run through an elementary-school crossing lane.

Barrett Bromich, senior in business administration and chairman of the Student Senate standing committee working for a traffic signal, said he is considering conducting a march through the intersection to bolster citzens' awareness of the heavy traffic flow. He believes the protesters will, in turn, pressure city commisioners to allot money for installation of the signal.

The negative aspect of Bromich's plan is that impeding traffic with student bodies may result in injury and will most likely anger Manhattan citizens with the unannounced inconvenience.

If Petty's study shows that the intersection warrants a signal, it will become part of the 1988-93 capital improvements plan. We then can urge University officials to help with funding so that future K-State students will benefit from our efforts.

In the meantime, the best approach would be to inform residents about the hazardous crossroad, and ask them to avoid driving through the intersection of College Heights and Denison during regular school hours.

Personality runs deeper than looks

SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Columnist

The scene is a local fast-food restaurant.

The characters are John, an employee, and Mary, the customer. John is completing another order for an extra-crispy chicken dinner when Mary enters.

Mary is a petite woman in her early 20s with golden hair that has been sculpted around her face. Pink rouge by Max Factor accents her high cheekbones, while lipstick and lip liner from Revlon highlight her full lips. Pink and blue eyeshadows and brown-black mascara, both by Merle Norman, draw attention to her large, oval eyes. Her baby blues twinkle at John underneath her tinted contacts as she flashes her now braceless smile.

Over an Espirit white cotton T-shirt she wears a Bennetton hot-pink, knit tank top over faded blue jeans with fashionable slits at the knees and a tear at the pocket. A wide, white leather belt rests loosely around her waist. White flats complete the ensemble.

Mary glides up to the counter and, with a flirtatious smile perched on her lips, bats her eyes coyly at John.

John is a tall, slender young man with broad shoulders and classic features. His sandy-blonde hair styled after Don Johnson accents his tanning-salon tan. The scent of Grey Flannel cologne envelopes him. His clear, green eyes (he, too, wears colored contacts) gaze at Mary.

Not wanting to mess up his only opportunity to impress this gorgeous creature, John licks his lips, sets his most dazzling smile on his face and asks if he may help her.

Giggling all the while, Mary replies that she'd like the two-piece snack advertised in the newspaper and a medium Diet Coke. She places her coupon on the counter and hands him the money. John hands Mary the change and gets her drink.

A female employee comes to the counter and picks up the coupon. Mary says that it is her coupon and hands it to John. But with a quick laugh, he tells Mary to keep the coupon and come back again.

Eager to please his customer, John tells Mary he'll be happy to bring the meal to her when it's ready. Mary graces him with another smile, thanks him and strolls over to a table. A minute later John brings her the food, steals another glance at her and walks back to the counter.

When leaving, Mary catches John's eye and tosses another smile at him. In return, John smiles and nods his head. Mary glides through the door and out of John's life.

Everyone has seen different versions of this one-act play. Although the scene may be Dillard's, an Aggieville bar or a football concession stand instead of a fast-food restaurant, three important characteristics underlie these encounters.

First, these momentary encounters are usually between one man and one woman. If two groups of people meet briefly, there can be multiple encounters. Second, one person will always instigate the flirting, while 95 percent of the time the other person will continue it.

Most importantly, these flirtatious meetings are the result of each person's physical appearance. Chances are, if Mary clomped into the building in skuzzy cut-offs and a knit tank top, John would have kept her coupon. Likewise, Mary wouldn't have batted her eyes if John had a slight build, skin the color of paste and thick glasses.

Americans' concern over physical appearance has made makeup and fashion two of the most prominent industries in our nation. Each person's desire to make a good first impression with his or her classmates, co-workers or family members has placed a great deal of emphasis on buying fad jewelry or updating a wardrobe with clothing styles in Gentlemen's Quarterly and Esquire.

Although maintaining a current wardrobe is important in Western societies, too much emphasis on these superficial material possessions de-emphasizes the role personality and character play in human relationships.

Instead of looking at the personality behind the facade, we assume the outward appearance is indicative of that person's personality. If the individual's appearance is pleasing to the eye, Americans assume the person has a sparkling personality. Likewise, if the person is homely, his personality must be poor.

Eradicating the fashion industry and banning cosmetics would not solve this deception. Only an awareness that appearances can be deceiving will guard against misperceptions.

Inner beauty may not be as visible as physical beauty, but in relationships it's the dominant feature.

Correction

Due to an editing error, a statement in Jess Cunnick's guest column "Senate must represent all students" in Monday's Collegian should have stated that part-time students are entitled to representation in Student Senate equal to that of full-time students whether or not they pay the full amount of special fees.

State crime rate shows increase in property, violent crimes

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation released statistics Sept. 12 reporting an overall crime rate increase of 12.3 percent in violent and property crimes in Kansas for the first half of 1986.

"Any time there is an increase in the crime rate, there is a concern for the community and the state," said Larry Woodyard, captain of investigation for the Riley County Police Department. "However, a 12.3-percent increase is not a disaster by any means."

The RCPD, which covers the city of Manhattan, reported a 16-percent increase in Part 1 crimes during the first half of 1986.

Part 1 crimes are classified as either violent or property crimes. Violent crimes, including murder, rape, robbery and aggravated assault, increased 3.5 percent in the county during the January-to-June report period.

Property crimes — burglary, larceny and motor vehicle theft — increased 13 percent.

The RCPD reported a total of 852 crimes. Only 18 of the reported crimes were classified in the violent crimes category, Woodyard said.

"Simple assault is not always included in Part 1 crimes," he said. "However, we report it in our local statistics because it takes investigatory time."

The number of reported offenses in Riley County for the first half of 1986 is below the eight-year average, which is 947 offenses, he said.

In Manhattan, there has been a 17-percent increase in crimes reported, with a vast majority of the them being larceny offenses, Woodyard said.

Theft of vehicles and vehicle parts accounted for 34 percent of the 511 larceny offenses, he said.

"The bulk of our (Riley County) crimes occur against property and not people," Woodyard said. "Property crimes are crimes of opportunity."

The K-State Police reported a 9.3-percent increase in the number of offenses reported, with 389 reported in the first half of 1986.

"We are running along with the national average," said Richard Herrman, campus police investigator.

The campus police cover any crime reported on campus, including crimes on vehicles while on campus. The police also cover Jardine Terrace, fraternities, sororities and the residence halls.

"We are like a small city with its own independent police force," Herrman said.

In its report, KBI noted some high increases or decreases in Part 1 crimes, which may be attributed to the implementation of the new incident-based reporting system that requires reclassification of certain crimes for state reporting.

Woodyard said Riley County was one of 10 pilot agencies to try out the new system before it went statewide in the fall of 1985.

With the new system, local statistics are reported to the KBI, and the bureau sends out statistics for the state, Woodyard said.

A reporting problem exists within the record-keeping personnel, said Richard Brede, assistant professor of sociology with a special interest in criminology.

"Keeping records is a harder job than it seems," Brede said, adding that the larger the county, the more accurate the statistics will be because of personnel assigned specifically to record keeping.

Another problem that arises is whether to report the offenses or the criminal if a person commits more than one crime, he said. Each case might be treated differently, causing reporting to become inconsistent.

Brede said he is cautious of short-term crime rate reports, because in order to accurately access the crime rate, long-term findings need to be considered.

Another way to look at an increase in the crime rate is the possibility that the police department is catching more criminals, he said.

For example, a police department may be low on manpower for a period of time, so the offenses reported may be low, bringing the crime rate down, he said. When the manpower is increased, chances are more criminals will be caught.

Weeks in zero gravity makes return difficult

Professor helps develop exercises to counter gravity effects

By JOHN EVANS
Collegian Reporter

Floating in space where there is zero gravity has negative effects on the human body, and a University assistant professor worked with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration this past summer to try to help alleviate this problem.

Ronald Bulbulian, assistant professor of physical education, dance and leisure studies, worked at NASA developing exercises to counteract the effects of zero gravity on astronauts.

"Space is a strange enviroment and the body adapts well to it but has problems when it (the body) comes back," Bulbulian said.

The study, titled "Exercise Counter Measures for Bedrest Deconditioning," centers around an observation of a person confined to bedrest for 30 days.

In the study, a person laid on a bed with his head tilted six degrees down from horizontal, forcing blood to the head.

This position was maintained 24 hours a day. The person was required to eat, sleep, go to the bathroom and exercise twice a day in this fashion, Bulbulian said. This will produce effects similar to those in zero gravity.

In zero gravity, body fluids are pulled toward the head, rather than toward the feet, and there is less stress and no pressure on the bones. Because the legs are not used much, they get weak and lose walking coordination/locomotion, he said.

Another problem people face when returning to gravity is orthostatic intolerance, which is the inefficiency of the cardiovascular system to adjust to gravitational stress, Bulbulian said.

"An example of this is when one has been lying in bed for a while and he suddenly jumps out of bed. He feels faint or faints because the blood has been pooling," he said.

"NASA is ready to build a space station in which shuttles will go back and forth transporting materials," he said. "We need to know how long people can stay up there, what kind of exercise to keep them healthy, how exercise can prolong their stay, and if it can help with orthostatic intolerence."

Another concern facing NASA is the possibility of a loss of calcium in astronauts due to zero gravity. Bulbulian said that without a sufficient amount of minerals, the bones become brittle and can break easily.

By attaching elastic cords to the astronauts, they can run in place and get resistance without floating off. Riding a stationary bicycle is another exercise that prevents cardiovascular deconditioning, Bulbulian said.

"The Russians carry their cosmonauts off on a stretcher and to the hospital to recuperate when they come back from orbit," Bulbulian said. "Americans like to see their astronauts walk off the shuttle because they think of them as heros and macho."

The GRIDIRON Grill

A cool, fall breeze blows a refreshing gust through the stands. Faithful K-State football fans shiver, braving the elements — and not-so-good odds — to cheer the home team on to victory. The enticingly fresh aroma of hot popcorn wafts from somewhere. Behind you, someone crumples the waxed paper wrapper of a hot dog. Another takes a gulp from his purple cup, gently tinkling the ice.

Cellophane crackles. A peanut shell loses its contents to a hungry fan and is dropped on the cement. Your mouth begins to water, and your concentration wanders from what's happening on the 38-yard line.

The game loses its appeal as your stomach makes its presence known. Of all things to happen, the nifty, colorful scoreboard suggests you "satisfy your hunger, go to the concession stand."

Famished, you excuse yourself and crawl over several pairs of knees to get to the aisle. You make your way to a concession stand to pick from an array of hot dogs, polish sausages, hamburgers, popcorn, peanuts, candy, colas, hot coffee and nachos.

Ahh, satisfaction!

The food at KSU Stadium has been a part of the games since 1968. But football fans aren't the only ones to have a selection of snacks. Baseball games, track meets and basketball games are all places to grab a "stadium steak" and box of popcorn to go with a purple cup emblazoned on the side with Willie the Wildcat.

Barb Warner, a Manhattan elementary teacher, runs the concessions at the football games as a part-time job.

Soft drinks are the big sellers at all the games, Warner said.

"Everyone wants a cold drink, even if they've just come from a tailgate party. That's what we sell the most of by far," she said. "The hot dogs come next. That's the traditional food at a football game."

The way the football team is playing has a lot to do with how the concessions sales go, Warner said.

"If they aren't playing well, we sure see it," she said. "There aren't nearly the crowds now that we saw when the team was winning."

Another big factor is the weather.

"When it's 70 degrees or below, we sell a lot of hot dogs and popcorn because people want to eat when it's cool out," she said. "When it gets 85 degrees or above, we sell a lot more Pepsi than food.

"If it gets above 85 or 90, no one buys much. They get a Pepsi and it's just too sweet to drink when it's that hot. People just sit and suffer. Or they leave."

Warner said the food sold at the games varies from year to year. For example, nachos were the big item a couple of years ago. Now, only two concessions trailers sell nachos.

"We started frying hamburgers last year, and that seems to be doing very well," she said.

K-State students make up the main working force behind the concession stands, Warner said. Several living groups work on a commission basis and can make between $1,000 to $2,000 a season, depending on the popularity of their stand. At each football game, 190 make up the work force.

When the stadium opened, the athletic department suggested that students work at the concession stands. Warner said it has worked out well.

"It's better for them than doing a bunch of car washes or bake sales to raise money," Warner said. "In the past, I've had other clubs and organizations work to raise money. Circle-K had a stand for a while. Four or five of the (greek) houses have been with us since 1968 when we started.

Most of the food at the stadium is comparable to the food at other schools, she said.

"The food we have is pretty standard," Warner said.

The stadium food comes from a large company in Wichita. The company, E.S. Webb, also supplies food to fairs in the Midwest.

"They (the company) start in June in Canada and end up in Texas in the fall. They just finished with the state fair in Hutch last week," Warner said.

Popcorn, soda pop and hot dogs aren't the most important parts of a football game. But, if the roar of the crowd and the stirring sounds from the band aren't enough, remember the call of the concession stand.

Tailgate Tradition Tried, True, Terrific

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Collegian Reporter

Whenever a K-State football game is in town, the KSU Stadium parking lot doubles as a playground for the proliferation of tailgate parties that spring up. The parties offer everyone from students to high school bands a chance to relax.

However, the term "party" can be misleading. For some people, a tailgate party can become a tailgate reunion. Council Grove's Phil Mahan and his family get together once a year at a K-State football game.

"We pick one game a year and have a family reunion in the parking lot before it," he said at the Sept. 13 game against Northern Iowa. "We get together, eat a ham sandwich or two and have a good time."

There are times, however, when "party" means just that. David Wagner, junior in journalism and mass communications, said partiers need to have the right supplies.

"We've got Sam (Weems, a friend of Wagner's), whose major is leisure studies, and he helps set things up. Plus, we've got hotdogs, chips, a grill and three coolers of beer," Wagner said.

The legality of the beer was not an issue for most of the tailgaters. A man fighting a huge fire on his grill assured everyone it was legal, "as long as it is in plastic cups," he said.

The alumni, though, have the classic tailgate parties. There are the middle-aged men wearing purple shirts and drinking choice beverages while their wives share gossip.

Don McNal, a K-State graduate from Council Grove, and his wife, Lucille, have had tailgate parties before K-State football games for several years.

"We've made it to just about every home game since they moved to the new stadium and to quite a few at the old one. It is a real event," McNal said. "We like to get in before the traffic and relax with friends before the game starts."

There also are organizations having tailgate parties. It was Band Day at the Sept. 13 game, and participants were everywhere. One girl in a baton-twirler's outfit was chasing a drummer who had a pink stripe painted down the middle of his hair.

The Manhattan Catbackers were another group having a party. Ken Schmelzle, a Catbacker member, said their picnic had a purpose.

"We are raising money for a scholarship to go to an area student athlete," Schmelzle said.

Athletic Director Larry Travis was at a somewhat formal tailgate party. He said he enjoys tailgate parties and he likes to see a lot of them.

"There is a wonderful tradition here of tailgate parties," Travis said. "People come together, share old times and relax. I always have a good time at tailgate parties."

As it neared game time, the parking lot started to fill. People coming in were seeking fun. Little did they know the fun had already started.

Understatement enhances movie

Under the rule of the junta, which controlled Argentina until 1983, more than 9,000 people disappeared. This doesn't include the many babies born in prison and subsequently put up for adoption.

Film Review

Director Luis Puenzo's "The Official Story" is the story of a history professor, Alicia, who adopted one of these children. The child, Gaby, a beautiful 5-year-old girl taken from her mother at birth, knows nothing about her real parents. And Alicia isn't interested in the child's background. She isn't interested, that is, until she meets an old school chum, Ana, who knows all about the terror of the junta from firsthand experience.

As the two women sit and talk over eggnogs, Alicia finds the real reason why Ana left Argentina without telling anyone goodbye: It seems Ana was abducted by the junta and held captive for more than a month. The story of her torture and rape forces Alicia to see the truth about the recent history of Argentina. When this happens, she begins to wonder about the true parents of her adopted child and decides to investigate.

This is just the beginning of a powerful drama which combines the suspense and intrigue of Hitchcock with the political drama of Costa-Gavras. Its power doesn't come from any action taken by the characters, but from action that must remain repressed. Alicia wants to ask her husband about the child's origins, but he provided her the child on a no-questions-asked basis. She wants to get information from the hospital and the missing persons center, but that would mean explaining her situation.

As Alicia's frustrations grow, she begins to confront the notion that her life has been guided by self-willed tunnel vision. She didn't see what had happened to the people in her country because she didn't want to see. This turns the movie into a parable of how the citizens of a country can allow a totalitarian regime to take control. And what's most remarkable about "The Official Story" is that it accomplishes this without ever appearing heavy-handed. It's a movie about people first.

Director Puenzo has fashioned a movie with a premium on understatement. A lesser director might have emphasized the elements of melodrama, heading for a get-out-the-hanky finale, but Puenzo remains truthful to his characters.

The finest touch of all is the way he uses the child. Once her origins fall into question, this beautiful little girl becomes a poignant, yet haunting figure.

"The Official Story" will be shown at 7:30 p.m. today and Thursday in the Union Forum Hall and 3:30 p.m. Thursday in the Union Little Theater.

Judge testifies before Senate panel, says 1984 tax fraud unintentional

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Harry E. Claiborne, portraying himself as an overworked federal judge too busy to worry about details of his tax returns, told senators Tuesday his 1984 tax fraud conviction stemmed from carelessness but not an attempt to cheat the government.

Claiborne testified after members of the Senate impeachment panel demanded that testimony by Jerry Watson, whose firm prepared the judge's flawed 1980 tax return, be referred to the Justice Department for possible criminal prosecution and charges of perjury.

Under questioning on the seventh day of his Senate impeachment trial, Claiborne repeated his assertions that he "had an impression in my mind that something was wrong" with his 1980 return, but did not move immediately to check out his suspicions.

"I had no reason to," he told Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. "I put it off out of necessity. We had an unbelievable, horrendous calendar in the federal courts in Nevada. I didn't have time to breathe. ...I neglected my personal affairs terribly."

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., said it "strikes me as being so stupid (that)...if you were going to conspire" against the government, that Claiborne would have chosen someone as unqualified as Watson to prepare his tax return.

"It sounds like I'm arguing your case," Warner said.

"I appreciate that, because I need all the help I can get," said Claiborne, who was convicted and imprisoned for two counts of tax evasion.

He told Sen. Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., that the errors and sloppy preparation of his 1980 return could be blamed on "a degree of negligence or carelessness, but I wouldn't define it as an impropriety."

Earlier, Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., demanded that the Justice Department investigate Watson's testimony because "we have seen a pattern of the most egregious form of fraud against taxpayers."

Rudman was supported by Sen. Albert Gore Jr., D-Tenn., who said Watson's testimony should be studied for possible charges of perjury before a congressional hearing.

Rudman also said he was asking the Internal Revenue Service to begin audits of every tax return prepared by Watson's firm.

Wildcats return home after losing 3 on road

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

The K-State volleyball squad will attempt to bounce back from a poor performance last weekend when it faces Oral Roberts University at 7:30 tonight at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats are now 4-5 on the season after losing three straight matches at the Quality Inn Classic in Las Cruces, N.M. The 'Cats will attempt to even their record against a young Lady Titan's squad that returns only three letterwinners from last year.

"I think it's real important that we play well," K-State Coach Scott Nelson said. "We need that shot in the arm to refresh our confidence."

Nelson also said the team was glad to be back in the friendly confines of Ahearn after its initial road trip of the season. Nelson said playing in Ahearn is "such an advantage," adding that he thinks the home-court edge is "good for several points a match."

Nelson was hard-pressed to come up with bright spots in the team's last tournament, but he did cite the play of sophomore Shawnee Call as one positive point. Call was named to the all-tournament team for the third consecutive weekend the 'Cats have played in a tourney.

Nelson, however, said the rest of the team's play was inconsistent, especially in its first two matches of the tournament, which K-State lost in straight games.

"I think that different players played well at different times, but we didn't function real well as a team," he said. "Our team wasn't real consistent, and individual play wasn't consistent at a high level."

Nelson said there were other factors in the team's sub-par performance.

"We were away for the first time, and for sure we were against the toughest competition we may see this year outside of one or two individual matches that remain," Nelson said.

Nelson found some cause for optimism, though, with the team's performance against the 20th-ranked Texas Tech squad in the 'Cats' final match. K-State took the Red Raiders to 19-17 in the first game and won the second game before falling three games to one in the match.

Nelson has been pleased with the way the team has reacted to the setback in practice, adding that the intensity level has been extremely high.

"I liked our practice yesterday," Nelson said Tuesday morning. "I anticipate another good practice today, and I anticipate a good performance on Wednesday. We can't really look ahead because we don't really need to fall into that trap. The Wednesday match is the one that really matters to us right now."

The match against ORU will be the 'Cats' last non-conference match before they open the Big Eight season Friday night against Iowa State in Ames. Admission to tonight's match is free.

Royals' overhaul begins; Motley traded to Braves

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals traded struggling rightfielder Darryl Motley to the Atlanta Braves Tuesday for minor league pitcher Steve Shields.

Motley was batting .203 and had seven home runs this season after hitting a career-high 17 homers last year, in 383 at bats. The three-year veteran has driven in 20 runs this season.

The Royals sent Motley to their Class AAA club at Omaha on June 9 and recalled him July 7.

Motley had started 1985 as Kansas City's regular leftfielder, but then platooned in right with Pat Sheridan and Lynn Jones after Lonnie Smith was acquired from the St. Louis Cardinals.

Motley finished the 1985 season with a .222 batting average 49 RBI to go with his 17 homers. But in the World Series, he hit .364 and in the seventh game hit a two-run homer run off John Tudor that started the Royals on the way to an 11-0 victory over the St. Louis Cardinals.

Shields had pitched most of the season at Atlanta's Triple-A club at Richmond, compiling a 9-8 record in 21 games. He started 20 games, completing six of them.

Shields, who had a 2.59 earned run average at Richmond, struck out 124 batters and walked 55 in 149 2-3 innings.

Shields was 2-0 for Richmond in the International League playoffs, pitching a 4-0 shutout in the final game over Rochester.

Appearing in six games with the Braves this season, Shields had no record with a 7.11 ERA in 12 2-3 innings.

Coliseum's circus act comes to end

TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

Well, what's done is done.

There probably has been no one issue on this campus in years as controversial as the proposed Fred C. Bramlage Coliseum.

Well, the new bids are in, and it would appear the circus is over. Groundbreaking ceremonies for the building are scheduled for Oct. 18, prior to the K-State vs. University of Kansas football game.

After the coliseum's initial bids were way over budget in 1985, bids were once again opened, and Tuesday the results came in — the coliseum will be built.

The announcement brings either joy or anger from the opposing camps.

Some have said the coliseum will be a showcase, not only for K-State athletics, but for the entire campus.

Others have said the resources being used to build a giant lockerroom would be better used in building a new library, or another academic branch of the University.

It's time to face the facts and realize there will be no new library, or business building, or journalism building for that matter. No, this fund raising was done by those interested in having a new basketball facility brought to the K-State campus to replace the aging Ahearn Field House.

This money was donated by people with like interests. It is unlikely that similar funds could have been generated for an academic building from the resources used to generate millions of dollars for the coliseum.

It is time to say the fund raising was a job well done. Some still believe in K-State athletic programs. Despite there being those who could give a dry heave whether the Wildcats win or lose in football, basketball or tiddlywinks, it is time to wake up and realize, like it or not, athletic programs are the primary focal point of the University's public relations.

With the bids coming in well under the projected budget, K-State officials may now go back and add items which were left off the stripped-down version of the coliseum.

I still have a few bones to pick about the coliseum, though. Tuesday when the announcement came the building would be built, George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, thanked all of the alumni who donated little or great amounts of money, and he especially thanked Fred Bramlage for his commitment to the project.

This is the typical "forget the students" attitude left over from the Duane Acker administration.

The student body of this school has donated much more to this project than anyone.

Every semester when we pay fees, we pay for a little of the coliseum.

And now we are forgotten. Well, let the officials of this school never forget that the students of today are the alumni with the checkbooks of tomorrow.

Nelson expands area's talent to help K-State

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

The job of recruiting has taken on new meaning this year for K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson.

For the first time in his seven years at K-State, Nelson is taking full recruiting responsibilities.

"In the past," Nelson said, "I've had a full-time assistant. Last year, Michael Denardo organized and ran our recruiting program. This involves talent assessment, correspondence with prospective players and arrangements for campus visits. Due to a budget cut, I've lost my assistant."

But Nelson doesn't necessarily view this loss as a detriment to his program.

"Losing my assistant has required me to become much more organized," he said. "I've had to make decisions about what types of players I need to go after earlier in the year. But we did such a good job recruiting last year that there is no pressure on me now.

"Even if I sign no one this year, we'll still be very good next year. That's not the situation I want, but we wouldn't lose ground if it occurred."

Not many college coaches could say this, but then again not many coaches have led their teams to six consecutive years of record improvement. Under Nelson's leadership, the Wildcats finished third in the Big Eight Conference last year and posted their first 20-win season, finishing the year 21-11.

Much of Nelson's success can be attributed to the way he approaches recruiting. He keeps tabs on prospective players during their junior and senior years in high school, plus he is actively involved in the United States Volleyball Association-sanctioned Juniors Program.

"Most everyone we recruit has been involved with the Juniors Program, and because of my involvement with the USVBA, we run a Juniors Program that involves players from this area," Nelson said. "Normally, I can't coach high-school athletes, but because the program is a non-profit organization and its purpose is development, the National Collegiate Athletic Association OKs my participation yearly."

Nelson said high school players try out for the juniors team, and if selected, participate in USVBA tournaments in the winter and spring.

"A problem for Kansas is the rural situation that exists," he said. "A coach is much more comfortable watching and meeting prospective players. We're not in a major metropolitan environment where you can watch players on a day-to-day basis.

"The Juniors Program offers a double benefit. For the players, it gives them experience plus exposure to other college coaches."

The Juniors team plays in tournaments in the mid-America region, which consists of Kansas, Iowa, Missouri and Nebraska. Nelson said the program offers players a way to market themselves.

"A side benefit, as far as K-State is concerned, is that the program is good for recruiting students," he said. "The Juniors' training and practicing takes place here. And if a player likes Manhattan and the campus, she may come to school here, even if she doesn't play volleyball."

Nelson said that when he recruits, he doesn't look for just a volley ball player.

"We're pretty highly specialized, and our program is to the point where unless a player has participated in volleyball outside of the high school season, her knowledge of the game and skills aren't up to par," he said.

"A player has to have certain qualities to fit our team," Nelson said. "Sometimes it's a shame because I've seen lots of good players that have been passed up because they don't meet our needs. But for them to come here anyway wouldn't be to anyone's advantage."

Nelson said he is evaluating what he needs for next year's team now, but the Wildcats lose only two of their 15-member squad after this year. Nelson signed all five of his top recruits last year. So, it appears K-State volleyball is changing from a bright present to an even brighter future.

Options of DUI offenders include jail, community service

By LORI LUGINBILL
Collegian Reporter

Convicted drunken drivers in Kansas can make decisions concerning their punishment. The choice is theirs: 48 hours in jail or 100 hours of volunteer community service.

Individuals convicted for the first time of driving under the influence of alcohol have a choice of serving the jail term immediately or completing 100 hours of community service, said Michelle Winston, Manhattan court services officer.

However, the choice comes in addition to a fine of usually $250, attending a drug/alcohol safety action program with a required fee of $110 and suspension of the driver's license for up to one year, Winston said.

Community service hours can be completed at University for Man, U-LearN, FONE Crisis Center, Sunset Zoo and a few other organizations.

"In the fall, more students serve the 48 hours in jail but take the 100 community-service hours in the spring," she said. "This is probably because during the fall students are in school and have other things to do."

Respone has been good from organizatons that allow volunteers from the court to provide community services. But Winston said it's just too bad it has to be under such circumstances.

Also, on the first DUI conviction, an individual can apply to the court for a diversion, Winston said.

The diversion option, if granted by the court and if the individual fulfills all the requirements, allows a DUI case to be dismissed. However, the individual still must complete 30 hours of community service, pay $110 and attend the drug/alcohol safety action program, pay a fine of no less than $200 and may face a suspension of the driver's license for at least 90 days.

Winston said the individual cannot spend 48 hours in jail instead of completing service hours under the diversion option.

"Either way, you're looking at a lot of expense and time," she said.

The conviction process starts when an individual is pulled over by a police officer on suspicion of driving under the influence.

A police officer will perform various field sobriety tests on a suspected drunken driver. It is up to the police officer to decide whether the person will be arrested, Winston said.

An arrested person is handcuffed and taken to the police station. The person's car must be driven home by someone else or towed at the owner's expense.

"I don't think most people realize how serious it is to be arrested for a DUI," Winston said.

An automatic six-month driver's license suspension occurs when a suspected drunken driver fails to take the breath test, Winston said. Also, the individual does not have the right to call a lawyer before taking the test.

More sobriety tests are performed at the police station on video tape, she said. This is to show the person's performance on the tests.

Wefald addresses history honorary on successful leadership qualities

By RONDA CORLE
Collegian Reporter

One person in the right place can make a difference, said University President Jon Wefald during a speech Tuesday evening.

"People tend to underrate the important difference one person can make in history," Wefald said.

Wefald spoke at the initiation ceremony for Phi Alpha Theta, a history honorary, in the Union Cottonwood Room. He emphasized his philosophy that leadership can be learned.

"I tend to believe that great leaders are not born," he said. "Walt Disney got a job at a newspaper, and was fired because he didn't have any good ideas. F.W. Woolworth was fired from one of his first jobs because he didn't have any sense."

Leaders have a common bond, he said. They have a vision and the ability to make decisions. Leaders also have self-confidence.

The secret to Reagan's success is his ability to convey good feelings and a sense of humor, Wefald said.

"You can't overestimate a sense of humor," he said. "You have to have a certain amount of humor."

Leaders also need to be able to delegate authority and have compassion and respect. Leaders need to trust others, Wefald said.

President Lincoln was the greatest president in American history because of the times he dealt with, Wefald said.

"He had a vision, a creation of focus and an agenda. Seven states had already seceded. The preservation of the Union was never elusive. He was a brilliant example of making decisions," Wefald said.

Lincoln acted on the vision he had for America and changed the course of history, he said.

"The average person has the potential for greatness. You don't have to have an IQ of 135 or high SAT scores to become great," he said. "Don't ever count out the common, ordinary people. They will rise to the occasion when you least expect it."

Leadership is a skill that can be learned through intuition, hard work, setbacks, willingness to take risks and learning from others, he said.

President Washington was a man of average ability but he surrounded himself with people more brilliant than he because he felt good about himself, Wefald said.

Lincoln felt good about himself. He had men on his cabinet who felt they would make better presidents until Lincoln proved himself in 1864 and 1865, he said.

The failures were men who were insecure about themselves, such as Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon, Wefald said.

"Who has known foreign policies better than Nixon? His problem was he was insecure and didn't trust anybody. Johnson treated people who reported to him with contempt, but it was the exact opposite if he was reporting to someone else. He was an insecure person," he said.

Wefald ended by emphasizing again that one person in the right position can make a difference.

"Put it this way," he said. "Some people look at the way things are and ask why. Others look at the way things could be and ask why not."

State funds aid farms, businesses

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — In a first-year review of Kansas' low-interest loan program for farmers and small businesses, state Treasurer Joan Finney Tuesday called it "very successful" and urged that it be continued.

At Finney's instigation, the state Pooled Money Investment Board began in September 1985 making state idle funds available to banks so they could offer economically distressed farmers and owners of small businesses operating capital at interest rates below the going commercial rates.

The most recent interest rate offered to qualifying borrowers was 7 percent, Finney said.

Banks are allowed under the program to add three percentage points to the loan rate they get from the state, to pay for their costs of servicing the loans and to allow them a modest return on the loans.

That means under the latest offering, the state provided banks the money at 4 percent interest and they made it available to qualifying borrowers at 7 percent.

"The risk factor for the banks on these loans is less because borrowers can repay 7 percent loans but have great difficulty paying a 15 percent loan rate under current market conditions," said Finney, a Democrat who is seeking reelection in the Nov. 4 general election.

"The program is designed to sustain agriculture producers and small businesses until the agricultural economy improves."

Farmers are eligible for maximum loans of $50,000 if 70 percent or more of their gross income comes from farming or ranching operations. Small businesses can get up to $200,000 in one loan if they have less than 100 employees.

The money is made available to banks on a first-come, first-serve basis. The banks make all the credit decisions and pledge securities to the state in case of bank failure.

In the four times the PMIB has offered the loan capital during the past year, 133 Kansas banks have taken some of the money to make the loans.

"Not only did individual bankers provide insight into the program, they continue to suggest alterations that are incorporated to achieve success in the program," Finney said. "People should understand that no expenditure of state funds is involved, nor are any state monies ever at risk."

Since Sept. 1, 1985, the Pooled Money Investment Board has made $61 million available for the loan program, including $25.5 million on Sept. 1 this year.

Finney said 1,337 loans have gone to state farmers and 150 to small businesses under the program.

When Finney first proposed the program in July 1985, Gov. John Carlin publicly questioned its value, but his Democratic appointee on the board, Economic Development Secretary Jamie Schwartz, eventually voted for it.

House approves legislation to commemorate Ike's 100th

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House approved a proposal Tuesday to establish a commission to plan and coordinate activities to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of former President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

"Eisenhower as general and as president led this nation in times of war and in times of peace. As we look back to his presidency, we have a fond remembrance of an era of peace and prosperity," said Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., who sponsored the proposal.

The measure, passed on a voice vote and sent to the Senate, would create a 21-member commission. Members would serve without pay. Among their duties would be planning ceremonies for a joint session of Congress, arranging exhibits at the Smithsonian and the National Archives on Eisenhower and coordinating with private agencies on other activities around the nation.

Eisenhower was born in Texas on Oct. 14, 1890. His boyhood home was in Abilene, which is the site of his presidential library.

The task force agreed to look into several different areas, including the effect a fee would have on students' budgets.

Group members also wanted to investigate projected revenue and expenditures in the athletic department, marketing surveys measuring ticket demand and the history of season ticket sales.

"We have to look at how its going to affect the students," said Kelly Lamborn, task force member and senior in journalism and mass communications. "The students have, more or less, put us here."

House to vote on final draft of tax reform

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A last-minute effort to restore full deductions for sales taxes and Individual Retirement Accounts apparently was doomed during a closed Republican caucus, clearing the way for a final House vote today on a landmark tax-overhaul bill.

Vote-counters working for the Democratic leadership predicted the bill will pass by a comfortable margin.

White House spokesman Peter Roussel said a letter from President Reagan appealing for passage of the bill was delivered to all members of the House Wednesday. In a speech Tuesday to a group of business supporters of the measure, the president said "we can't afford to become complacent."

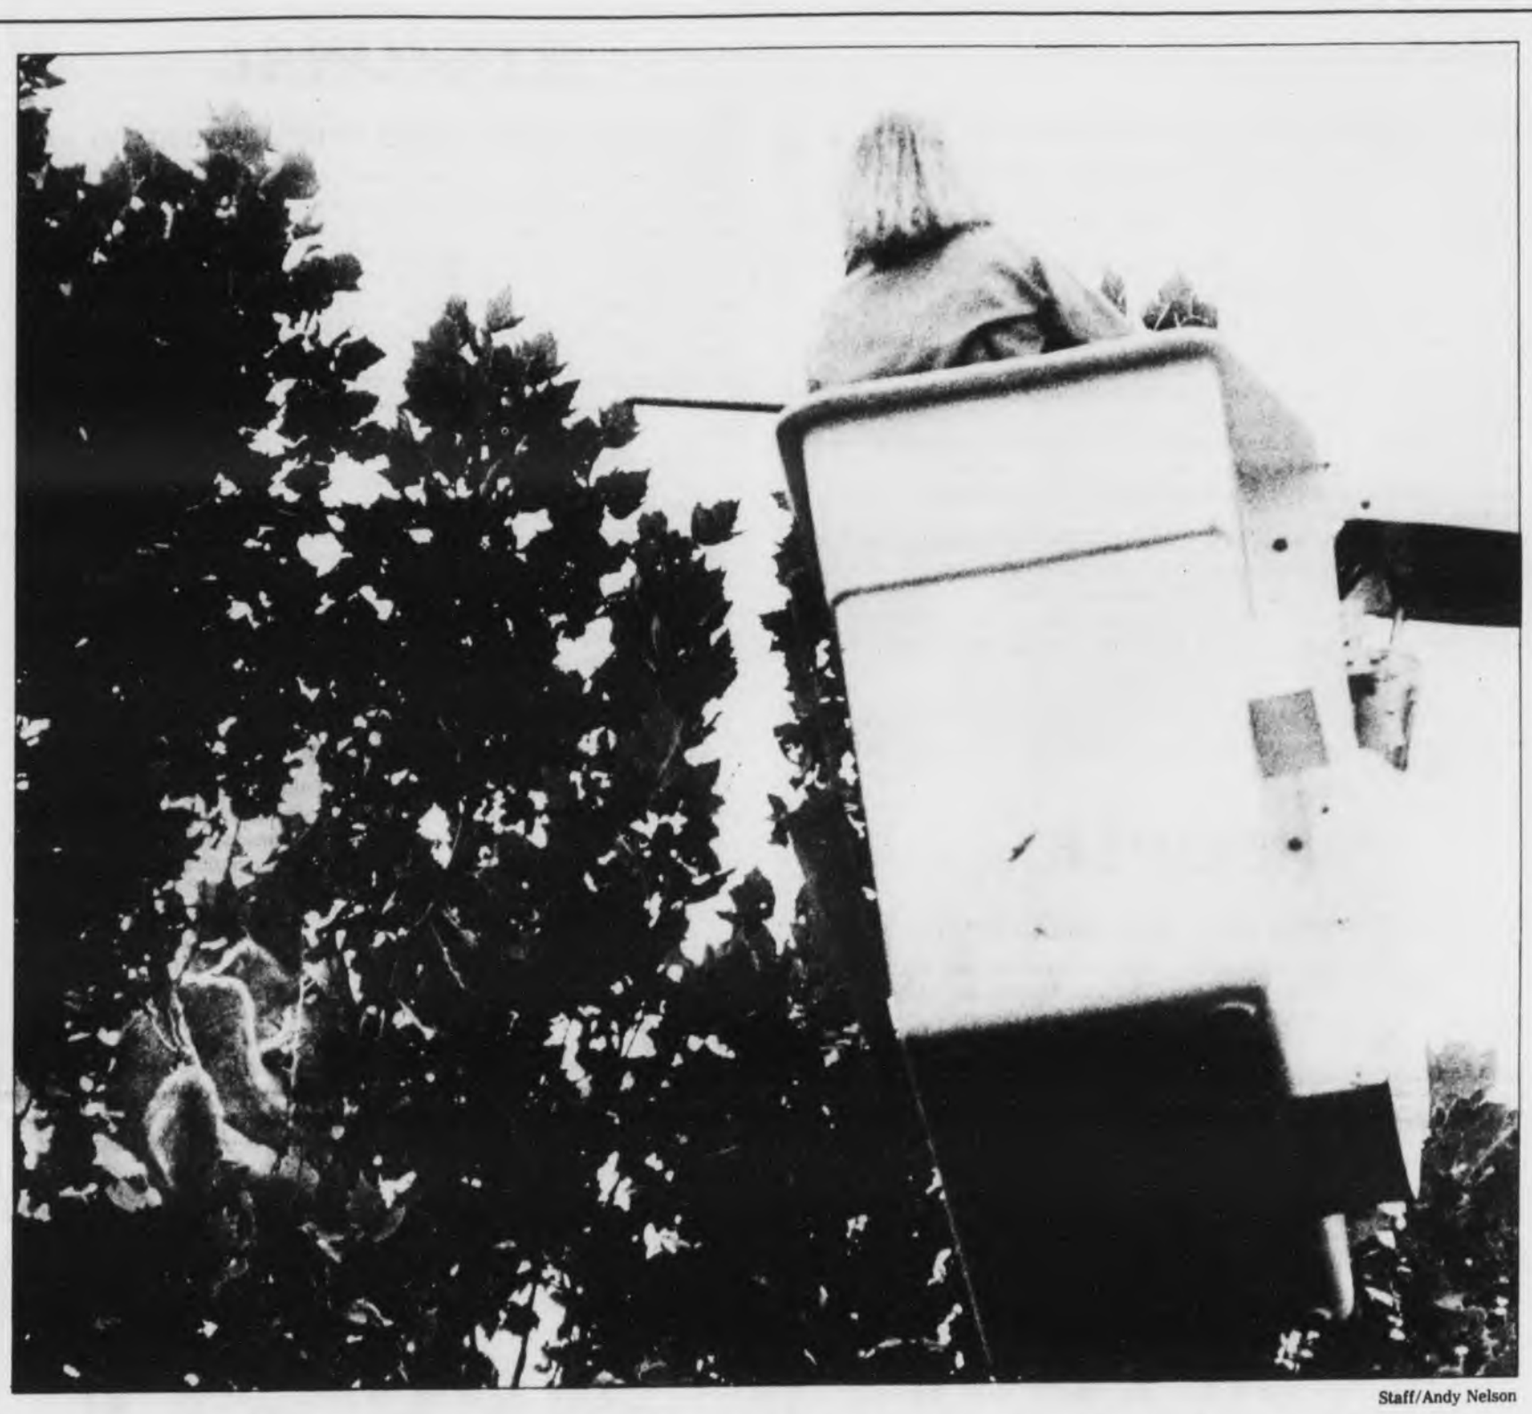
A count complied by Rangel showed 104 of the 253 Democrats solidly in support of the measure, 35 leaning toward approval, 42 undecided, 33 leaning against and 35 solidly against.

Rep. Jack Kemp of New York, chairman of the Republican conference, predicted the 180 Republicans would be split 2-1 or 3-1 in favor.

Combining the two parties' most conservative estimates would result in a total vote of about 280 for the bill. If all 433 members are present, 217 votes would be required for passage. There are two vacancies in the 435-member House.

The compromise bill cannot be changed; the House and Senate must accept or reject the entire package.

In his letter to House members, the president said, "Now, as we approach the end of a long and sometimes difficult journey toward historic tax reform, I again ask for your support."



Reagan cited key elements of the bill and noted that when the House first passed its version of the measure he had promised he would not support a final version of the legislation which failed to meet certain criteria.

"Thanks to the hard work of the Senate and the conference (which drafted the compromise bill), the legislation now before you meets these tests" of fairness, the letter said.

The president also reiterated his opposition to any increase in tax rates.

"I trust you know that once this bill is enacted I will not support any

Sunset Zoo curator Caroline Meeks, in lift bucket, nears Andy, left corner, a Japanese snow monkey that escaped Tuesday, to shoot him with a tranquilizer in an effort to capture the animal around noon Wednesday. Andy was captured about 6:30 p.m.

Escaped primates go 'out on a limb'

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

No, it was not part of the "Great Ape Escape."

But Manhattan residents may have thought Sunset Zoo was still promoting its fund-raising campaign for a new primate exhibit after the escapades that began Tuesday morning.

That's when three Japanese snow monkeys, two females and one male, escaped from Sunset Zoo and went "out on a limb" to tour the city.

The first, a female, was recaptured Tuesday.

The zoo was closed Wednesday so that visitors wouldn't scare the remaining two monkeys away if they tried to come back.

Zoo officials, together with Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department workers, spent Wednesday tracking the other two critters from one neighborhood to the next.

"I thought at first it was a fraternity- or sorority-type thing," said Ted Hodges, professor in architectural engineering and construction science, when he saw a group of people run by his house with a net.

By 5 p.m., the group had chased Andy, the male monkey, up a tree in a densely-wooded area south of Hodges' house at 1919 Poyntz Ave.

By 5:45, with the help of a Parks and Recreation Department cherry picker, one man in the tree and about a dozen people on the ground with nets, Andy was nearly cap-

Recent poll reveals doctors take drugs

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Nearly 40 percent of doctors under age 40 admitted in a survey that they used marijuana or cocaine to get high with friends, and a quarter of doctors of all ages said they recently treated themselves with mind-affecting drugs.

Overall, more than half the physicians and three-quarters of the medical students who participated in the Harvard University survey said they have used drugs at least once for self-treatment, to get high or to help them stay awake.

Only 1 percent of the doctors surveyed said their drug use had ever caused them to give poor care to patients.

Most physicians use these drugs only occasionally, if at all. But the researchers say medical students and young doctors are more experienced with drugs than are older physicians. And they predict that the proportion of drug-taking doctors will grow as medical students set up practice and take their habits with them.

"Perhaps for the first time," they wrote, "appreciable although small proportions of persons entering medicine have histories of extensive drug use and dependence."

But they concluded that the drug use they found "should not be cause for great alarm," because it simply reflects growing drug use throughout American life.

"When psychoactive drug use becomes a fad and is approved by the broad spectrum of society, just about all groups get involved," said Dr. William E. McAuliffe, the study's director. "That includes physicians and pharmacists as well, the people who are usually the keepers of the drugs."

McAuliffe, a researcher at the Harvard School of Public Health, published his findings in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine. His study was based on a random survey of 500 practicing physicians and 504 medical students in Massachusetts conducted in November 1984.

In an accompanying editorial, Dr. David C. Lewis of Brown University recommended more emphasis on the dangers of drug abuse in medical school.

Student response shows 'no sweat' victory for foam cups

By SHERI DIRKS
Collegian Reporter

Like Coca-Cola loyalists, the University student body has grown attached to Styrofoam cups. When food service personnel switched from foam to clear plastic cups last summer, students were not amused.

In response to complaints submitted to the Union suggestion box, Flavor View plastic cups in the food service are being replaced with the previously used foam plastic cups, Union Director Walt Smith said at a meeting Monday.

Rich Patterson, sophomore in chemical engineering, said he preferred the foam over plastic cups because of their insulating ability and because he feels more comfortable throwing them away.

"I hate the plastic cups because they don't retain the initial temperature of the liquid as well as the Styrofoam does," Patterson said.

"Everyone thinks the plastic cups are in-between throwing them away and keeping them. If you keep them thinking you're going to use them again then you take them home and they clutter up your countertop," he said.

Susan Russell, sophmore in industrial engineering, said she prefers the foam cups because they don't sweat.

"I'm tired of my papers getting wet because my cup drips water everytime I take a drink," Russell said.

Malley Sisson, food service director, said the Flavor View cups were part of the food service area's redesign.

One major reason for the change in cups from foam to clear plastic was the amount of space the foam cups required compared to the space the plastic cups require, she said.

The number of cups that can be stacked at the beverage area is about 50 percent more for the Flavor View cups, because of the smaller lip on the cup, she said. This is important, Sisson said, because the beverage area is smaller, because of the redesign, and there is less room for cup dispensers.

"That means that going with the foam cups there will either have to be more dispensing units or there will need to be additional labor spent for constantly refilling with foam cups," Malley said.

Sisson said fulfilling either of these is not a problem.

Customer efficiency was another objective.

Agency to place probe on comet

NEW YORK — The European Space Agency has committed $400 million to a mission to land a space probe on a comet and bring back as much as 30 pounds of its nucleus to Earth, a scientist said Wednesday.

"We're not just talking about a hypothetical mission — it's going to fly," said John Wood of the Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics in Cambridge, Mass. The launch could come as early as 1995, he said, but likely will be at least several years later than that.

Wood, a geologist, is a member of a committee of U.S. and European scientists who have been meeting for a year to propose experiments for the unmanned flight and are just completing their report to the European Space Agency.

He delivered a report on the status of the mission to the Meteoritical Society, which is holding its annual meeting this week at the American Museum of Natural History.

Only once before have extraterrestrial materials been harvested and brought back to Earth — in a series of manned Apollo missions to the moon in the 1970s. The comet samples would come from much farther away, however, with the sampling point being between 350 million and 550 million miles from Earth, Wood said.

Italy approves Libya's sale of Fiat

TURIN, Italy — Premier Bettino Craxi and an employers' federation praised an agreement under which Libya will sell its 15.19 percent stake in Fiat S.p.A., ending a politically embarrassing tie for the Italian automaker.

The company's largest shareholder and two banks will buy back Libya's shares for about $3 billion.

There was no immediate comment today from Libya on why it agreed to the sale, although Italian newspapers speculated that amid falling oil prices Libya could use the infusion of cash.

Libya reported the agreement in a two-paragraph Rome-datelined dispatch by its official news agency, JANA.

"It's possible that the Libyans realized that they were no longer wanted as major shareholders in one of the largest industries in Europe," the Rome daily La Repubblica said in a front-page editorial.

Craxi expressed his "satisfaction and appreciation" about the deal, while Luigi Lucchini, president of the large Confindustria employers' confederation said, "It's also good for national pride."

The sale was long sought by Fiat, Italy's largest private employer, which viewed the Libyan stake as a political liability and an obstacle to obtaining contracts in the United States.

Under the agreement announced Tuesday, the West German Deutsche Bank and the Italian Mediobanca will buy about $2 billion worth of common, preferred and savings shares in Fiat, to be offered to new investors.

Nuclear protester released from jail

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A nuclear arms protester serving a prison term for damaging a missile silo was released Wednesday after he told a federal judge he would not break the law again.

Martin J. Holladay, 31, was serving an eight-year prison term for damaging a Minuteman II missile silo with a hammer and chisel. He was sentenced May 16, 1985 for damaging the silo near Odessa in western Missouri in February 1985.

Holladay was one of nine protesters serving sentences ranging from seven years to 18 years for damaging missile silos in Missouri.

Senate approves highway program

WASHINGTON — The Senate approved on Wednesday a $52.3 billion highway program that would raise the maximum speed limit to 65 mph on interstate roads between cities and bar construction of billboards along federal highways.

The action came after senators voted 65-32 to delete a provision to discourage contractors and suppliers from doing business with South Africa.

The plan, which envisions $12.35 billion in federal highway aid annually starting in the current fiscal year and extending through fiscal 1990, now goes to a conference committee with the House.

A major provision adopted 56-36 Tuesday would enable state legislatures to raise the speed limit to 65 m.p.h. on interstate highways outside communities with populations of 50,000 or more.

It would affect an estimated 70 percent of the interstate system.

The action contrasted with House rejection of a five-year trial of a 65 m.p.h. limit on rural interstates. That proposal fell short 198-218 in an Aug. 8 vote.

Townspeople sleep with sidearms

WRIGHT CITY, Mo. — Police pressed the search Wednesday for a former mental patient sought in a three-state rampage of murder and abduction, and authorities said they believed he was still in the area although the trail was growing cold.

Townspeople, meanwhile, were stocking up on ammunition and some even said they were sleeping with their guns at their sides.

"We're assuming that he's still around here," said Missouri Highway Patrol Capt. John Ford. "We're talking about a man who has demonstrated that he has no respect for life or property. If he were out of this area, I think something would have happened by now."

Federal, state and local law officers have been hunting for Michael W. Jackson, 41, since he allegedly went on a crime spree that started Monday in Indianapolis.

Authorities suspect Jackson shot to death two people and abducted four in Indiana, and that he killed one man, wounded a police officer, abducted one person and tried to abduct two others after he crossed Illinois and reached eastern Missouri. Jackson, armed with a sawed-off shotgun, also committed two robberies and commandeered several vehicles, authorities said.

Candidate asks details of lawsuit

TOPEKA — Dennis Moore renewed his frontal campaign assault on Attorney General Robert T. Stephan Wednesday, demanding the Republican incumbent provide the voters of Kansas a full explanation of the settlement of a sexual harrassment lawsuit more than a year ago.

"For months now, people have been asking me questions about Mr. Stephan's 'problem,'" Moore told a news conference. "They ask me questions that he should be answering."

Moore said Stephan's use of taxpayer money to defend himself in the lawsuit, and a second one brought by the same plaintiff, means the public has a right to know everything about the settlement.

He also told reporters Stephan's "statements and conduct in settling that case as attorney general have raised serious questions — questions of character, judgment, integrity and credibility" which are legitimate issues in the race for attorney general in the Nov. 4 general election.

Students converge for Journalism Day

By The Collegian Staff

About 1,200 high-school students will converge on the University campus today to learn how to produce better newspapers, yearbooks, photographs and advertisements.

The Kansas Scholastic Press Association and the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications are co-sponsoring the fifth annual Fall Journalism Day in Kedzie Hall and the K-State Union.

Dave Adams, director of Student Publications Inc., said the event, the largest journalism workshop in Kansas, has grown every year and is about at capacity. The Union rooms and the Stateroom will not accommodate more than 1,200 people.

The program is divided into four one-hour sessions. During the sessions, 13 speakers will make presentations that students can attend.

Adams said the speakers will be high-school and community college newspaper advisers, University faculty and students, representatives from other college publications and professionals. Sixty speakers are scheduled.

Tom Rolnicki, executive director of the National Scholastic Press Association, is scheduled to give the keynote speech at 1:40 p.m. in the Union Forum Hall. He is from the University of Minnesota.

University student photographers are to give a slide presentation at the beginning of the program titled, "Photojournalsim: Shooting for Success."

Some of the guest speakers are Greg Gamer, news anchor for KSNW in Wichita; Joe McGuff, editor of the Kansas City Star; and Mike McKenzie, from the Kansas City Star and Times.

Students from each school will have the opportunity to have their publications individually critiqued. High-school advisers and University faculty will meet with each school's staff for about 20 minutes and critique their work with them, Adams said.

The students can attend workshops concerning, "A Future in Journalism?" "Laser Typesetting and the School Publication," "Using Words Effectively," "What I look for When Hiring a Journalist," and "In Journalism, It's the Law."

Local businesses host 'After Hours' events

By LISA CARLIN
Collegian Reporter

Restaurant management students demonstrated their skills Wednesday evening at the College of Human Ecology's Business After Hours program in Justin Hall.

Students of the program served catered refreshments to a crowd of more than 200 at the first event of its kind at the University. The Business Networking Committee of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce sponsored the event.

Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology, said new programs in restaurant and institutional management, and nutrition and exercise science have had a positive effect on the college's student enrollment levels which are currently holding steady.

After the dean's speech, students led tours of the facility.

Tours included a feed and exercise study where laboratory rats running on a treadmill demonstrated how exercise affects cardiovascular rates and overall health. The demonstration was sponsored by the Department of Foods and Nutrition.

The tour also included a demonstration of the various equipment used to process potatoes into french fries in the Quantity Foods Laboratory. Participants who stayed to watch the entire procedure also were treated to a sample of the goods.

Diet analysis by computer to determine nutrient, calorie and vitamin content, and flavor and Vitamin C analysis of orange juice were two other demonstrations included in the tour.

Those who toured the Meat and Poultry Laboratory saw sausage processed.

Wendy Schiappa, director of public affairs for the Chamber of Commerce, said the Business After Hours program is a "perfect partnership."

Schiappa said one chamber member described the program as so successful that it turned "cold" telephone calls into new contacts for the chamber. She said the program has been popular nationwide for five years.

The host of the event can promote their accomplishments and make the community aware of what they do. In turn, the chamber has an opportunity to bring people together to make new contacts and sell memberships, she said.

Schiappa said the program has been so popular that 11 Business After Hours events have been scheduled for 1987 by different businesses and organizations in Manhattan.

Recent test results disclose cocaine can cause seizures

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The anesthetic effect of cocaine can sensitize the brain to later, potentially fatal, seizure attacks from small amounts of the illicit drug, according to animal test results disclosed Wednesday.

Researchers at the National Institute of Mental Health in Bethesda, Md., said studies with rats show that cocaine can have a "kindling" effect that makes the brain more sensitive to the drug over time.

Drs. Robert Post and Susan Weiss said their research indicates the brain may be more susceptible to developing lethal convulsions from repeated cocaine use than from a single large dose, which also can cause fatal seizures.

"Our studies suggest that this 'kindling' process might easily mislead users into thinking they are taking a safe dose when, in fact, they are gradually lowering their brain's threshold for seizure and sudden death with each snort or toke," the researchers said.

Other work presented at a seminar sponsored by the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Administration also pointed to new, potentially serious brain complications associated with habitual marijuana use.

Dr. Philip W. Landfield of Wake Forest University, Winston-Salem, N.C., said animal research indicates the active ingredient of marijuana, a chemical called THC, may affect the structure of the brain in the same way as aging.

State agriculture committees receive updates on research

By The Collegian Staff

Members of the Kansas House and Senate agriculture committees convened on campus Wednesday to hear updates on agricultural research programs and tour two facilities.

The members of the two legislative committees, the House Agriculture and Small Business Committee and the Senate Agricultural Committee, met with faculty from the colleges of agriculture and veterinary medicine to discuss recent developments in research and program activities.

In his welcoming address to participants, University President Jon Wefald stressed the importance of agriculture in the state of Kansas.

Wefald said he hopes farm prices will rebound so that another great era will come for farmers and ranchers in Kansas.

Topics discussed at the conference included the international meat and livestock program, non-food and non-feed wheat research, and the farm assistance program.

Committee members also were in Manhattan to attend the annual Kansas Farm Bureau governor's tour today.

Mike Johnson, assistant to Wefald, said some members will remain in Manhattan today and Friday to participate in the task force for economic development in agriculture.

The group toured Weber Hall to check on construction promoted by the two committees, Johnson said. The greenhouse project, located behind Throckmorton Hall, was inspected to check progress on the 23,000 square foot addition which was funded by appropriations.

Drug testing violates rights in Constitution

Mandatory drug testing on the college level is a violation of the Constitution, whether it involves athletes or the entire student body.

Forming a standardized policy for the testing of athletes has recently become a consideration for the Kansas Board of Regents institutions. This idea corresponds with the National Collegiate Athletic Association's plan to test athletes at the national college level.

Testing students for the presence of drugs is a violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. The Fifth Amendment guarantees the right of protection against self-incrimination. Testing for drugs is a form of self-incrimination.

Although the right to privacy is not specifically mentioned in the Constitution, the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized privacy as a constitutional right since 1960.

The first eight amendments, plus the 14th Amendment, include the right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure and the principle of due process of law. The Declaration of Independence demands "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" for all. The Supreme Court decided from this evidence that the right to privacy was an important concern of the Constitution's founders, and therefore, a constitutional right.

Forcing all students to subject themselves to be tested for the presence of drugs is a violation of privacy as can be seen by all the supports used by the Supreme Court to establish the constitutional right of privacy.

The argument for testing only athletes leads to student discrimination. It is hardly fair to test some students just because they chose to participate in collegiate athletics. All students deserve the same and equal rights.

Public outrage would result at the mere suggestion of testing the American population for the presence of drugs. Students are part of this population and deserve the same rights.

City should welcome KANU radio services

The Manhattan listening area is gaining a new radio station that may take some weight off the shoulders of KSDB-FM.

Sometime this fall KANU-FM, the University of Kansas public radio station, will receive a translator to relay its signal to the Manhattan area, allowing listeners to receive KANU static-free.

KANU will bring programs to the area KSDB can't offer. KANU is a National Public Radio station providing listeners with programs including "All Things Considered," a daily news program, the Metropolitian Opera and Garrison Keillor's popular "Prairie Home Companion." KSDB can't offer these features because even though they have access to it through KKSU-AM, National Public Radio will not allow its use by a non-NPR affiliated station.

KANU makes up what KSDB lacks in consistency. KANU offers mostly jazz and classical music, with more diversity on weekends like big band sounds and classic rock.

The station and its programming should be welcomed in Manhattan. Its professionalism and format are as needed here as in Lawrence.

Tries at nuclear waste disposal fail

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

In the 1950s scientists, politicians and businessmen convinced the American public that nuclear power was the energy source of the future. Lewis L. Strauss, Atomic Energy Commission chairman from 1953 to 1958, predicted, "Our children will enjoy in their homes electrical energy too cheap to meter." Plans were made for atomic-powered airplanes, dirigibles, rockets and cars.

But somewhere in all the visionary planning a key question was overlooked: What is to become of radioactive wastes? In 1957, the Dow Chemical Company reported to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, "We feel it is important for all to know that (the waste) disposal problem has been taken care of by new technology recently developed." But Dow Chemical lied.

The "new technology," known as "well injection," amounted to dumping liquid wastes into abandoned oil and gas wells. In 1959, the American Petroleum Institute reported to Congress that there were "no insurmountable obstacles" to this procedure. Fortunately, scientists realized before it was too late that this "new technology" would contaminate water supplies and vast areas of land. The "new technology" was subsequently scrapped.

Next the atomic industry resigned itself to a policy of "storing" liquid radioactive waste — waste that would remain hazardous for thousands of years — in tanks with life spans of probably less than 50 years. If the tanks began to leak before a permanant solution was found, the waste would be transferred to new tanks. That procedure continues to this day, while a permanent solution has yet to present itself.

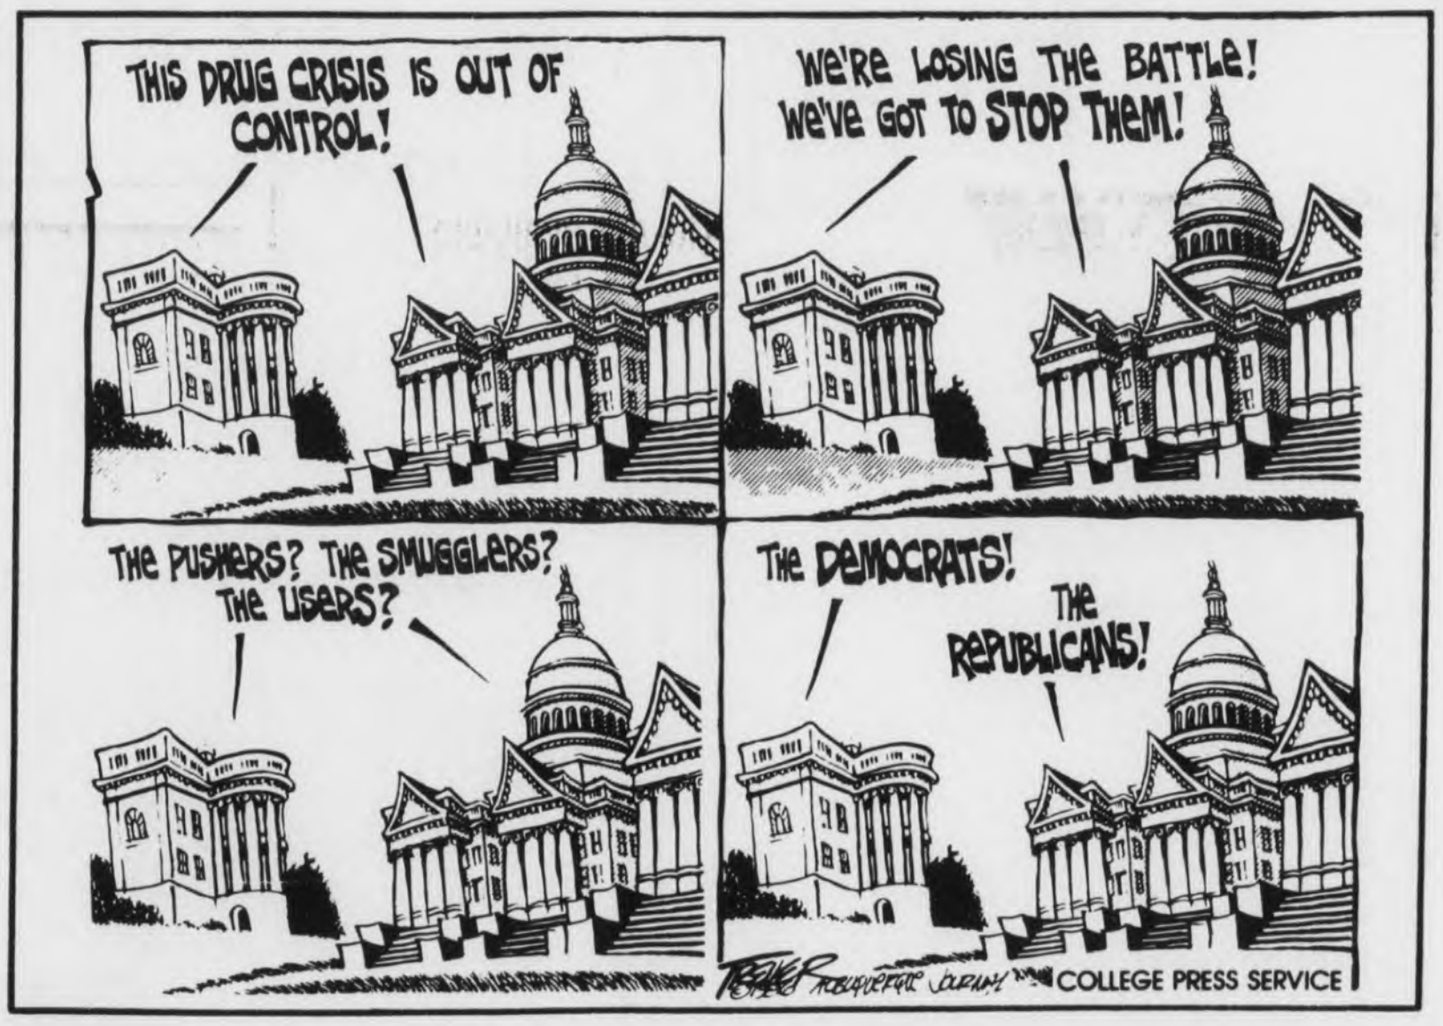
Through the 1960s and into the 1970s the federal government, scientists and the nuclear industry touted reprocessing as a solution. Reprocessing would involve dissolving spent fuel rods, recovering the reuseable uranium and plutonium for fuel, and storing the remaining waste in isolated underground repositories after being converted from liquid to solid form. Atomic Energy Commission officials agreed from the beginning that for nuclear energy to be safe, yet economically feasible, at least 20 chemical reprocessing plants would be needed to avoid the buildup of spent fuel rods at power plants.

The nuclear power industry spent more than $100 billion and constructed three reprocessing plants — one in Morris, Ill., that never opened due to a flaw in its design; one in Barnwell, S.C., that was never finished due to enormous costs; and one in West Valley, N.Y., that performed unsatisfactorily for six years before it closed in 1972 and left 572,000 gallons of highly radioactive liquid waste. As a result, the buildup of spent fuel at power plants, the situation that was to be avoided, has become a reality.

I mentioned that radioactive waste continues to be stored in tanks until a permanent solution is found. I didn't say it stays there. In 1974, the Atomic Energy Commission reported that plutonium dumped at Maxey Flats, Ky., "has remained immobile and therefore constitutes no potential hazard." The federal government had guaranteed in the 1960s when it began dumping at the site, that the waste would move no more than half an inch in 24,000 years, which is the half-life of plutonium.

However, in 1974 the Kentucky Department for Human Resources conducted its own study and found the plutonium had moved hundreds of feet into neighboring properties and into streams. The Enviromental Protection Agency later confirmed this. In 1977, a study conducted at the request of the Kentucky Legislature reported that amounts of plutonium in the air were more than 10 times what the Nuclear Regulatory Commission allowed at power plants.

At West Valley, the site of the defunct reprocessing plant, cleanup crews attempted to stop the advance of plutonium by adding kitty litter to absorb the waste. It didn't work and the plutonium, one of the most toxic man-made substances, continued to move.



In 1967, the U.S. Geological Survey determined that a proposed dumping site at Sheffield, Ill., "appear(ed) to be suitable for burial of low-level solid radioactive waste." However, the dump was closed in 1970 after radioactive waste had seeped into neighboring properties.

This story has an extra twist. In 1980, the U.S. Geological Survey, the same agency that had taken responsibility for pronouncing the site, "suitable for burial," wrote in a letter to a resident of the area, "It is not our responsibility to make any determinations as to adequateness of the site. This is the responsibility of the regulatory agencies both of the state and federal government."

A nuclear waste burial ground at Hanford, Wash., has its own history of mishaps. In 1959, an employee of General Electric, which was responsible for the waste at Hanford, testified before a subcommitte of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, "No environmental hazard will exist as long as the tanks maintain their integrity...." The underground storage tanks, however, had begun to leak as early as 1958.

In 1973, a tank at the Hanford site leaked liquid waste for 49 days before workers discovered the problem. More than 115,000 gallons of highly radioactive waste seeped into the ground. In 1980, a government report at the site classified 20 of the 156 tanks as "confirmed leakers" and 38 others were considered "of questionable integrity."

The saga will continue well into the forseeable future, as an acceptable solution to the problem of nuclear waste has yet to be found. I have nothing against nuclear power — society has benefited greatly since scientists discovered how to harness the atom four decades ago. What remains to be seen is not what nuclear technology will do for us, but rather what the misuse of that technology will do to us.

Vietnam inhumane

Editor,

Re: Kirk Caraway's column, "U.S. tyranny apparent in Vietnam," in the Sept. 15 Collegian.

Caraway's article had a very appropriate conclusion: "This column is not a definitive history of Vietnam..." He's right — his article could never be accused of being "definitive."

One would have to conduct research and have the intention of telling the whole truth — something Caraway didn't pretend to do. Only two documented facts are presented in the article:

— The United States feared a Kahn-Buddhist alliance.

— The Viet Cong had the real support of the countryside.

Yet from these facts, Caraway concludes that U.S. foreign policy in the world is to deprive all freedom-loving people the rights of democracy and humanity. Did I miss a link?

With only 300 words allowed for my letter, I'm unable to pinpoint each contradiction in Caraway's reasoning (if I dare use that word). Yet, the most nauseating of Caraway's lies is that the United States loses to North Vietnam on the scale of humanity. Current events update: Amnesty International has Vietnam on the 10 worst violators of human rights in the world, and recently Vietnam pounded what was known as Cambodia into oblivion — sending thousands of refugees into Thailand (which the "inhuman" United States now feeds). I don't see any of them signing up for the Ho Chi Minh fan club. I suggest that Caraway watch "The Killing Fields" for examples of Vietnam's humanity.

I used to be mad at Caraway for his column. Now I pity him. He criticized this country pretty well — which is his right. I'd love to see how far he'd get doing the same thing in Vietnam or any Communist country.

France independent

Editor,

Re: Phil Nordhus' column, "U.S. allies show two-faced attitude," in Tuesday's Collegian.

Earlier, whenever I met an American, he always asked me, "Why don't the French like us?" I didn't understand, but after reading your column, I know why.

France is an independent state with its problems and glories. I don't know why this free country has to obey orders from another state, even if it is a friend. France knows the price of a tactical and nuclear army because we have our own army, independent from any other nation. There are no soldiers in France other than French soldiers. Please remember that we are not in NATO.

Why the United States entered World War II was a reaction to Pearl Harbor and not because of European statesmen. The United States came to Europe because if the Nazis had won in Europe, America would be alone against the world.

The Marshall Plan was for economic, political and financial reasons. Without reconstruction after World War II, U.S. products would not have had any customers. It was good fortune that most American firms were internationalized. That's why the American way of life has traveled all over the world.

If countries enjoy the direct or indirect protection of the United States, the United States is also glad to find some countries to put weapons in to defend itself.

You see innocent Americans killed in Vienna or Rome, but don't forget Germans, Italians, English and French who were killed by bombs were innocent, too. We didn't want to share in the U.S. project of bombing Libya because terrorism is too easy in France and Europe. The borders between countries are close together. After a terrorist places a bomb in Paris, he can be out of France in two hours.

Try to understand why we can't say to the world that your planes can pass through French airspace. It's only because we are interested in human life. There is a big difference between courage and suicide. If you need a good example, the Kamikaze was courageous, but suicidal.

Stations fix prices

Editor,

Re: The article "Lower gasoline prices fuel profit losses for local distributors" in Thursday's Collegian.

The misleading nature of the title of this article is exceeded only by the shallowness of the reporting contained therein. You have clearly been misled if you think that anyone except the consumer is suffering because of the current gas price levels in Manhattan. The story you should be concerned with is not why prices are as low as they are and why, but why they are as high as they are and why!

I had previously sent to you ample documentation that clearly shows the retail dealers in Manhattan have consistently worked together to keep the prices 5-15 cents higher than in surrounding areas, and they have apparently agreed not to compete.

The body of your article contains repeated indications that the current price has not hurt local dealers. On the contrary, their business is better than before. What's more, their profits are even better than when the price of crude was higher because they have not reduced the retail price in proportion to the decrease in crude. Combined with the collusion that keeps the prices as high as they are, it should be clear to everyone we are being gouged.

What's a few cents, you ask? In the first place, it is not a "few cents" at all. The amount extra we pay for the "privilege" of living in a town where there is no real competition amounts to almost 15 percent of the total cost. In the second place, consider that every nickel overcharge per gallon translates into about $500,000 per year in surplus profits. Take out your pocket calculator and prove it for yourself: 5 cents multiplied by the number of cars in town multiplied by 10 gallons per fill-up multiplied by the number of fill-ups per year. Fill in your own best guesses as to how many cars are in town and how often they are filled, and you'll see the magnitude of the problem.

Finally, the picture illustration accompanying the article is a blatant fraud. I have been carefully monitoring Jerry's Auto, among others, and the price has not changed in almost a month, and the last change then was an increase.

What ever happened to the tradition of investigative (not powder puff) reporting? If you're not interested in learning the truth, why bother to ask questions?

Policy causes hatred

Editor,

Re: Phil Nordhus' column, "U.S. allies show two-faced attitude," in Tuesday's Collegian.

It's "Reagan youth" conservatives like Phil Nordhus who think the United States has helped Europe out so much that they should agree with all our policies, right or wrong. Nordhus states that our allies are preventing the United States from performing "our duty." Is it "our duty" to entice the Soviet Union to fight on our allies' soils? No wonder European nations are hesitant to accept U.S. cruise and Pershing missiles — it's their backyard that gets destroyed in the ensuing conflict!

Christopher Lasch states in "'Traditional Values:' Left, Right, and Wrong" from Harper's Magazine, Sept. 1986, that conservatives endorse "a willingness to resort to force." Using this force to clash in other lands causes anti-American feelings. Just because a friend disagrees with your view doesn't mean you walk all over him or her to get what you want.

It's time the conservatives in the United States stop acting like we're the best and start working on making us the best. The conservative Reagan policy of using our friends to obtain our goals causes hatred — pure and simple.

Constitution revision faces Student Senate

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate will vote tonight on a revision to its constitution.

The bill will allow each college one senator for every 300 students, full-time and part-time. Currently, each college is allowed one senator for every 300 full-time students.

Part-time students are required to pay between one-half to the full amount of enrollment fees which the Senate helps allocate.

Senate will also vote on an amendment requiring a senator to to be a student in the college or school which he or she represents.

Two appointments are also to be made tonight to fill vacancies in the Student Traffic Appeals Board.

The board's duties include hearing appeals of parking violations.

One of the vacancies is due to a member who did not return to University, said Sally Traeger, chairwoman of senate and senior in marketing.

Senate is also to discuss a bill dealing with left-over money some campus groups have from funds allocated last year.

Senate meetings take place at 7 p.m. in the Union Big Eight Room and are open to the public.

University music groups run for funds

By KRISTI KRUCKENBERG
Collegian Reporter

K-State music ensemble members will "run for the money" Sunday when they participate in the University's fifth annual "Music Run" fund-raiser.

Members of K-State's Concert Choir, Collegiate Chorale, Mens' and Womens' Glee Clubs, Kansas State Orchestra, K-State Marching Band and the K-State Singers will run from 2 p.m. to 3 p.m. at R.V. Christian Track to raise funds for their respective ensembles, said Rod Walker, professor of music and director of choirs.

Each music student distributed pledge sheets to friends, family and alumni in the first part of September. Sponsors of the students pledge so much for every lap the student completes within the one-hour time limit, he said.

"If a student really plans ahead and gets as many sponsors as possible, a lot of money can be made," Walker said.

The money each student raises generally goes directly into the ensemble's account. If a student is a member of more than one music ensemble, the funds raised are split between the two groups.

If the music group is planning a major trip, however, funds raised may go into the student's personal travel account.

"The best thing about this particular fund-raiser is that the money each person raises directly benefits his or her music group," said Robert Clasen, senior in journalism and mass communications.

The event's proceeds will help pay for ensemble travel expenses, including meals, hotel stays and transportation.

"When the Concert Choir is on tour, a typical lunch for the group costs about $350," Walker said. "A hotel stay costs the group about $1,000 each night."

The K-State Marching Band travels to one away football game each year, and the funds band members raise will help pay the expenses of this trip, Walker said.

Funds raised will also help defray expenses for sheet music, concert programs, publicity and recruiting purposes, he said.

"Not only is this event a fund-raiser, but it's also a 'spirit booster' for the students," Walker said.

Music is provided for the students to run or walk by, and the event is as fun as it is beneficial, he said.

"Even though I'm not much of an athlete, I still have fun," said Janell Wilmot, junior in music education. "With the music blaring, it's easy to get pumped up."

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

1105 SUNSET AVENUE 913-776-3300

LEFT: Seventh-black belt Master Chae Sun Yi has dedicated more than 30 years to Tae Kwon Do. He was captain of the Head Corps Champion Fighting Team for the Republic of Korea Army prior to coming to the United States in 1973. ABOVE: Self-confidence and a good technique are essential to being effective at self defense, said second-degree black belt Elizabeth Baird, right.

Mastering the art of...

TAE KWON DO

Jane Yi attempts to break a board with a leaping kick but falls away after impact. As a sport, Tae Kwon Do utilizes the use of many muscles making it one of the best methods of all-around physical fitness. But as a method of self-defense, it can be used as a forceful weapon.

Tae Kwon Do is unmistakably the love of Master Chae Sun Yi's life.

Yi, who is a seventh-degree black belt, has dedicated 30 years to Tae Kwon Do. Mastering it is more than just learning a sport, it is incorporating the philosophy into your life, Yi said.

Yi's goal is to teach students and help them become masters, so they can teach others. He believes that through Tae Kwon Do students can learn respect for life and ultimately make the world a better place to live.

Yi said he attempts to develop masters from students of Tae Kwon Do as West Point develops generals from soldiers. Masters are knowledgeable in attacking and defense, but more importantly they have the skills to make mental decisions and to justify their actions.

"Killing people is simple, but saving people is very hard," Yi said.

Before coming to the United States in June 1973, Yi was captain of the Head Corps Champion Fighting Team for the ROK (Republic of Korea) Army.

At seventh degree black belt, Master Chae Sun Yi is one of the highest ranking members in Tae Kwon Do in the world.

In Korea, he trained army instructors in Tae Kwon Do, enabling them to teach soldiers on their way to Vietnam and Taiwan.

Yi said the methods of teaching for combat are quite different from those he uses now. Combat training focuses on winning because a soldier is fighting for his life, Yi said.

Currently, he teaches at K-State and Topeka and oversees the instruction of students in schools at Emporia and Salina.

Yi, 44, started in Tae Kwon Do when he was 14 and obtained his seventh-degree black belt in 1980. He hopes to achieve his eighth degree in a year or two.

At seventh degree, Yi is one of the highest ranking members in Tae Kwon Do in the world.

There are nine degrees of black belts, with first being the lowest and ninth the highest. Testing for rankings from white to fifth-degree black is based on techniques. Those sixth degree and above are tested upon how the individual integrates Tae Kwon Do philosophy into his or her life.

Yi said criteria for obtaining his eighth degree includes age, personality, spirit and dedication to the sport. To be an eighth degree, the person must be at least 45 years old, prove dedication through time, show the amount of respect students demonstrate for their instructors and document the number of students trained in Tae Kwon Do and their rankings.

Yi has instructed several thousand students; of these, five are currently his assistant instructors. Two of them, James Craeton and Rick Chaffey, are fourth-degree black belts and the other three, Seiji Kuwata, Pat Overby and Mike Parr, are third-degree black belts.

Yi teaches Tae Kwon Do to students for physical fitness and self-defense. His classes concentrate on form and technique instead of fighting skills. Through form and technique, students learn to respect life, Yi said.

Elizabeth Baird, a second-degree black belt from Topeka, said a person needs a good technique and self-confidence to defend themself. When a person has achieved both, Baird said, they can be effective.

The intense training skills learned in Tae Kwon Do can be applied to other sports, Yi said. For example, golf is a sport that takes most people years to perfect.

Many people on the golf course lose their temper and simply don't think of how to correct the mistake, Yi said. He believes by studying the techniques and keeping one's temper in check, golf can be mastered more quickly.

Although breaking boards demonstrates the power and skill of a Tae Kwon Do student, the sport itself utilizes many muscles of the body making it one of the best all-around physical fitness methods. The extensive use of muscles makes the body a natural weight regulator for people of either sex and of all ages.

As a method for self-defense, Tae Kwon Do is one of the best. The Korean word itself means hand and foot — no other weapons are used.

If ever attacked, Tae Kwon Do cannot be taken away from the person and used against him as a knife or a gun could. A Tae Kwon Do student always has their weapon with them.

Yi attempts to split a board held by assistant Rick Chaffey, a fourth-degree black belt. Chaffey is a former student of Yi's and a product of his goal — to teach students and help them become masters, so they can teach others.

A stack of split boards lie next to an empty box near the end of a class. Yi emphasizes the teaching of form and technique more than fighting skills.

Associate dean cites excess of jobs for graduates in agricultural fields

By CHRIS DOLL
Collegian Reporter

David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture, said 48,000 jobs in agriculture are projected to open up annually, but only 44,000 graduates will be available.

Mugler was among speakers at a conference held by Kansas Farm Bureau and the College of Agriculture to kick off the 12th Annual Governor's Farm and Ranch Field Day.

He said three factors are accountable for the shortfall.

The first factor, he said, is that the demands on the agriculture industry are expanding because of the increase in world population.

Mugler said another factor is that many current farmers with advanced degrees in the field are nearing retirement age. Mugler said the future need is greatest in the areas of teaching, research and extension at universities and in the industry.

The third reason cited by Mugler is the decreasing enrollment in agricultural curricula. He said the number of agriculture students is declining along with the number of traditional college-age students.

"Someone is going to have to be in the fields producing food," Mugler said. He also said additional people will be needed for conservation, education, research, communication and agriculture-related industries.

Participants at the conference were also told about a computer software system designed for farmers.

Freddie Poston, associate director of the Cooperative Extension Service, and Stephen Welch, extension staff and program director presented a computer program called "Pro Systems," written by Welch.

"The program pulls together the information we have and synthesizes it into a decision-making factor," Poston said.

The program helps farmers determine the most efficient and inexpensive ways to produce corn, wheat and beef. It also allows the farmer to select the stage of production they want to manipulate, with the program stating the possible alternatives within the stage. The farmer uses different numerical factors to determine the most profitable combination.

"We want to sit down and work though a series of alternatives to develop the best program for increased profitability," Poston said.

Users can change all the variables in production, he said, including how much and what kind of fertilizer is best, how much acreage to put in government programs and what their payment will be from the government, and how much to plant per acre.

The program is to be distributed to county extension offices after those personnel have been trained. He said this would allow users assistance when the program does not work as planned.

"If you don't have someone to answer questions that come up you fail," Poston said.

Houston Ballet troupe to be first in McCain's performance series

By MARY LYNN GATSCHET
Collegian Reporter

The world of fantasy and fairy tales comes to life Monday night on the McCain Auditorium stage with the Houston Ballet's production of "The Sleeping Beauty." The ballet is the season opener for the 1986-87 McCain Auditorium Performance series and is expected to sell out.

Stephen Riggs, director of McCain Auditorium, attributes the public's response to several factors. The Houston Ballet ended McCain's last season with the production of "Giselle" which was a "fairly good production. Their reputation has carried over to this year," Riggs said.

He added that "The Sleeping Beauty," based on the fairy tale, has popular appeal and a variety of people are familiar with the story.

Riggs regards the choice of the season opener as a good one.

"It's a very large, spectacular production. It's a fully mounted production (which includes) two truckloads of costumes and scenery that will definitely fill the stage." The company carries an international reputation as being an "extremely competent classical ballet company."

The ballet includes a prologue and three acts. It opens at the christening of Princess Aurora as the fairies present their gifts for the baby. The procession is interrupted by the arrival of the wicked Fairy Carabosse, enraged at not being invited to the festivities. She tells the king and queen that, although their daughter will grow into a beautiful girl, she will prick her finger and die. The Lilac Fairy intervenes, promising that Aurora will not die but will sleep until awakened by the kiss of a prince.

Act I begins on Aurora's 16th birthday. She must choose one of the four princes for her future husband. The wicked Carabosse, in disguise, hands her a bouquet of flowers in which a spindle is concealed. As Aurora falls to the ground, the Lilac Fairy appears and casts her spell, putting everyone in the castle to sleep.

Act II opens 100 years later as Prince Florimund and his hunting party are discovered resting in a glade. When the prince is alone, the Lilac Fairy comes to him showing him a vision of Aurora, with whom he falls in love. He begs the Lilac Fairy to lead him to the sleeping princess. Journeying to the castle, he is confonted by Carabosse, whom he overpowers, and upon finding the princess, awakens her with a kiss.

The ballet ends in a great hall of the castle with everyone gathered to celebrate the wedding of Princess Aurora and Prince Florimund.

K-State volleyball squad members Kristi Jacquart and Cindy Durham try to block a hit from the Oral Roberts University team Wednesday evening in Ahearn Field House. K-State won three games of the five-game match, 15-9, 8-15, 16-14, 7-15, 15-8.

'Cat spikers dash Lady Titans, 3-2

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State's volleyball squad evened its record at 5-5 with a five-game victory over Oral Roberts Wednesday night at Ahearn Field House before a crowd of about 250 people.

Oral Roberts dropped to 2-5 on the season.

The 'Cats, coming off three straight losses at the Quality Inn Invitational in Las Cruces, N.M., over the weekend, took the first, third and fifth games in a match which lasted more than two hours.

"I was real pleased (with the team's play). This was an important match for us," Coach Scott Nelson said.

"What was important about this match, like I said going in, it wasn't that we win or lose, it was what level we played at. Basically, we played at a fairly good level," he added.

The Wildcats jumped out to an early lead in the first game of the match and cruised to a 15-9 win. Oral Roberts reversed the tables in the second game and evened the match at a game apiece with a 15-8 triumph.

The next game turned out to be a pivotal one as K-State rallied from a 11-6 deficit to win the third game of the match, 16-14. The 'Cats fought off two game points and took advantage of some untimely Lady Titan mistakes as they took a 2-1 lead in the match.

K-State also fell behind early in the fourth game, but this time they couldn't catch up as Oral Roberts reeled off the last seven points of the match to win 15-7.

The 'Cats continued the pattern as they trailed early in the fifth game as well, but recorded seven consecutive points to take an 11-4 lead behind the inspired play of senior Cindy Durham enroute to a 15-8 victory. Durham had several key kills with her vicious hitting at the net.

Nelson said he was pleased with the entire squad's effort.

"The thing that sticks out in my mind was that when it came down to time to win, we did," Nelson said. "We had one or two people just really take charge in the fifth game."

Nelson cited the play of Durham in particular, as well as the that of sophomore Shawnee Call and senior Helen Bundy, as being important keys in the last game's outcome.

Nelson also noted how a balanced team effort, in which almost every squad member saw action, contributed to the win.

"It was a good team effort," he said. "That's nice when you have several different people that come in and help."

Bundy, who has just recently rejoined the team after recovering from a knee injury, saw extensive action at the middle blocker position.

Nelson said her physical play at the net was a big lift to the Wildcats.

"Helen came in and played to her strengths, which were serving tough, hitting and blocking," he said. "Helen is real physical along the net."

Nelson said he was also pleased with the play of several of his less experienced players. He mentioned freshmen Tami Tibbets and Lynda Harshbarger and sophomore Val Kastens as examples.

"The thing that sticks out in my mind was that when it came down to time to win, we did."
— Coach Scott Nelson

"Lynda Harshbarger came in and played real tough in the middle part of the match, passed for us, got some kills. Tami Tibbets, who kind of had her confidence shaken a little bit this weekend, came in and produced. Val Kastens, early in the match, came in (and played well)," Nelson said.

"That's nice when you have several different people that come in and help. It may not have been the prettiest volleyball, but it was all right," he added.

The Wildcats see their next action Friday night in Ames, Iowa, as they open the Big Eight Conference season with what Nelson calls a "big match" against Iowa State. K-State will also shoot for its first road victory of the year Friday.

And on Saturday, the 'Cats sqaure off against Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa.

It will be a while before the Wildcats see the friendly confines of Ahearn again. The K-State spikers play three straight matches on the road and then participate in the Autumn Classic Invitational at Springfield, Mo., before returning home to square off against Missouri on Oct. 10.

A Million Thanks to the Students of Kansas State! (make that Seven Million)

The new multi-purpose coliseum that will be built on our campus beginning a few weeks from now is a tribute to your vision, enthusiasm, commitment and pride.

Students developed the idea for the coliseum, students had a major role in providing the money for the coliseum (fund-raising chairman Fred Bramlage has said that were it not for the enthusiasm and substantial commitment of the students it would have been impossible to raise the supplementary funds) and students were deeply and directly involved and significantly affected the decisions and discussions that have resulted in the concept that is about to become a reality.

As chairman of the Coliseum Program Committee and on behalf of the administration I thank you and I salute you.

Oklahoma State coach 'bumfuzzled' about Cowboys' start

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Big Eight football teams are a somewhat disappointing 9-11 after the first three weeks of play. This causes at least one coach, Oklahoma State's Pat Jones, to invent a unique way of explaining losses to non-conference opponents.

The Cowboys are 1-2 after successive defeats by Tulsa (27-23) and Houston (28-12), so Jones quotes "sniglets," saying Oklahoma State players are "bumfuzzled."

"I don't know where I heard it first," Jones said. "Perplexed, confused, that's what I've always meant bumfuzzled to be. I guess when you don't know exactly how you feel, you're bumfuzzled. We've got kind of an epidemic of that (in Stillwater)."

OSU linebacker coach Kevin Steele added, "Before you can be bumfuzzled, you've got to know where you're headed to start with. Sometimes our guys don't know where they're headed."

Other statistics and comments from around the conference include the following.

Nebraska coach Tom Osborne talking about I-back Keith Jones:

"The thing with Keith Jones coming on is, Keith has tremendous speed. If he gets a little bit of room, he's going to go the distance. Nobody can catch him."

Jones leads the conference in rushing with 226 yards in two outings. The 'Husker I-back averages 6.8 yards every time he carries the ball.

This week's game between No. 1 Oklahoma and No. 2 Miami is the 20th time in 51 years of the Associated Press poll that the top two teams have met, according to Bob Herson of the Daily Oklahoman.

OU, the defending national champion, holds a 2-1 lead in the series but last year the Hurricane stumped the Sooners 27-14 at Norman — Oklahoma's only loss of the season.

CBS-TV will air the game, and kickoff from the Orange Bowl is slated for 2:30 p.m. CDT.

The Big Eight/Raycom game of the week is Arizona at Colorado with a scheduled kickoff of 12:38 p.m. CDT.

Colorado, which beat Arizona 14-13 last year, leads the series against the Arizona Wildcats, 12-0. But this season Colorado is off to a 0-3 start while Arizona, a member of the Pac-10 Conference, is 3-0.

Other conference games include Wichita State (1-2) at Iowa State (1-1); Illinois State (1-2) at Oklahoma State (1-2); Indiana State (2-1) at Kansas (1-1); Indiana (2-0) at Missouri (1-1); and Oregon (2-1) at Nebraska (2-0).

All Big Eight teams lead series races against this week's collection of non-conference opponents.

Kansas' Milt Garner ran two punts back for touchdowns in a 16-13 win over Utah State at Lawrence Saturday.

A 74-yard return late in the third quarter was called back because of holding, but Garner's 58-yard run-back late in the final period sparked the Jayhawks' win.

According to Garner, it was apparently an example of deja vu for defensive end Phil Forte.

"Phil came up to me and said he had a dream. He said I returned two punts for touchdowns. I said 'OK, Phil, thanks for the confidence.' Then all of sudden it happened," Garner said.

In holding Utah State to 77 yards in total offense, Kansas recorded its best defensive day statistically since 1961 when the Jayhawks limited Kansas State to 35 yards total offense.

Kansas defensive tackle Lyndall Yarnell commenting about a fumble-causing tackle by teammeate Jamey Steinhauser:

"He hit him so hard his helmet flew off. It's hard to hold onto the ball when you don't know where your head is."

Iowa State quarterback Alex Espinosa said the Cyclones regained some respect in their 64-9 humiliation of Indiana State after losing 43-7 the previous week to intrastate rival Iowa.

"Everything was on the line — fan respect, respect for ourselves. Our fans didn't leave at halftime," said Espinosa, who is second in the conference in total offense.

Espinosa needs 390 yards to surpass former Wildact field general Darrell Dickey as 10th on the Big Eight career passing list. Espinosa is currently 13th with 3,609 yards.

With Oklahoma, Iowa State and Nebraska each scoring more than 50 points last week, keep in mind the last time three Big Eight teams scored more than 50 points was in 1975 when Oklahoma State, Colorado and Nebraska did so.

Besides tieing a school record with three consecutive field goals last week (48, 28 and 40 yards), K-State place kicker Mark Porter is 10-of-11 for his career.

Minnesota, in its 63-0 loss to Oklahoma Saturday, ran just one offensive play in Sooner territory. The Gophers recovered a fumble at the Oklahoma 48 and subsequently lost yardage back into their own territory the next play.

Twenty-three Big Eight defenders have recovered one fumble this year — no defender has recovered two.

Big Eight home attendance figures show that after 12 games, average attendance is up by more than 300 fans per game. On the other side of the scale, K-State is ranked last among conference schools in the percentage of stadium filled category.

KSU Stadium, with a seating capacity of 42,000, has only been filled to 65.6 percent of capacity during the Wildcats' first two home games.

Meanwhile, Nebraska leads the conference in the same category with a 103 perecent attendance for the 'Huskers first game.

NCAA announces drug testing plan

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The National Collegiate Athletic Association announced details Wednesday of a sweeping drug testing program and said it will screen athletes who participate in this season's college football bowl games and the 64-team college basketball tournament.

NCAA Executive Director Walter Byers called the plan "the most comprehensive and reliable program of any organization in the United States."

The testing will include virtually all NCAA-sanctioned inter-collegiate sports, including football, basketball, baseball, golf, track, gymnastics, skiing, tennis, rifle competition and others, according to Byers.

The NCAA will not test athletes during the regular seasons, but only during championship competition. The program will begin in November, perhaps with the cross country championships.

"It's a leadership program, but I think its impact will be felt throughout the NCAA member institutions," Byers said.

Byers said he hopes it eventually will deter drug abuse on college and high school campuses across the country.

The drug testing will screen athletes for dozens of substances, including illegal drugs such as cocaine and marijuana, as well as steroids, extensive amounts of caffeine and other stimulants, Byers said at a press conference.

Byers said urine samples might be taken both before and after games. If an athlete tests positive for any of the substances, most of which are not controlled under criminal laws, he or she would be declared ineligible.

And if the test comes after a championship game, a winning team with an athlete testing positive would forfeit the game, he said.

The NCAA will not publicly disclose the names of athletes found to test positive.

The program will cost approximately $950,000 to implement in its first year, and the NCAA will contribute $2 million to laboratories that will expand their testing efforts, Byers said.

At the same time, the NCAA will spend an additonal $430,000 on a drug education program that will send videotapes and other materials to schools and youth groups.

Ruth Berkey, an assistant NCAA executive director, said that about 90 universities and colleges had their own drug testing programs — a number that likely has increased since the cocaine intoxication death of University of Maryland basketball star Len Bias in June.

The tests, Byers said, will be supervised by laboratories at the UCLA Medical Center and the National Institute for Scientific Research at the University of Quebec in Montreal.

Each has worked with the International Olympic Committee, Byers said.

Federal judge refuses to reduce Bells' sentences

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — A federal judge has refused to reduce the four-month prison terms being served by Kansas City Chiefs defensive end Mike Bell and his twin brother, Mark, and the two have decided against appealing their cocaine convictions.

In an order signed and filed Tuesday and made public Wednesday, Senior U.S. District Judge Wesley E. Brown said he had reviewed a file provided by the Bells' mother. It contained letters from supporters of the 29-year-old twins.

The judge said the sentences he imposed July 31 were correct. He said in the order that granting the Bells' request for modification of the sentences would be inappropriate.

The time allowed for the filing of an appeal of the convictions ran out earlier this month. Mark Bell's lawyer, Lael Alkire of Wichita, confirmed there wouldn't be an appeal.

Alkire said the Bells are in prison because they are victims of excessive media coverage of their case and the political popularity of campaigning against drug use.

Wichita attorney Mike Wilson, who represented Mike Bell, wasn't available for comment Wednesday. His receptionist said he was busy with clients.

"Why shouldn't they (continue to assert their innocence)? I don't ordinarily allow my clients to claim anything but innocence."
— Attorney Lael Alkire

Mike Bell was sentenced to concurrent one-year prison terms on each of two felony counts of using a telephone to arrange a cocaine deal. The judge said he would be released on parole after serving one-third of the sentences.

Brown gave Mike Bell a suspended sentence and placed him on probation for two years on a misdemeanor count of attempting to possess cocaine. The judge ordered participation in a drug aftercare program that includes urinalysis during the probation period.

Mark Bell, a former National Football League player with the Seattle Seahawks and the Indianapolis Colts, also drew a one-year prison term on a felony count of using a telephone to arrange a drug deal. The judge said he would be released on parole after serving one-third of that sentence.

Mark Bell also received a suspended sentence on a misdemeanor attempted possession count and was placed on two years probation with the same drug aftercare requirements as his brother.

Both Wichita men were fined $5,000 and ordered to pay $75 to the federal crime victims' fund.

Mike Bell's status as a professional football player will be decided after he has served his sentence, according to a spokesman for the NFL.

The twins began their sentences at a Minnesota minimum security federal prison facility Aug. 11. They are scheduled for release in December.

They could have been given maximum sentences of four years and $10,000 fines on each felony count and one-year and a $5,000 fine on the misdemeanors.

At their sentencing hearing, the brothers asked for probation with a community service provision attached. U.S. Attorney Ben Burgess argued against that request by noting the Bells continued to refuse to acknowledge their guilt.

Alkire protested during the sentencing hearing by saying the defendnants had a constitutional right to continue to deny their guilt. He said they had been cautioned about making any incriminating statements that might affect their appeal, should they decided to file one.

When asked Wednesday if the twins continued to assert their innocence even though they have decided against an appeal, Alkire said: "Why shouldn't they? I don't ordinarily allow my clients to claim anything but innocence."

Ripken Sr. expected to replace Weaver

By The Associated Press

BALTIMORE — The Baltimore Orioles, an organization known for promoting from within, are expected to name Cal Ripken Sr. as manager for the 1987 season.

The 50-year-old third base coach, who has served the organization 30 years and has been with the parent club since 1976, would replace Earl Weaver.

Weaver announced earlier he is heading into his second retirement at the end of the season.

"It's not going to be an outsider, unless something drastically changes," a team source told The Associated Press Wednesday.

'Everyone would be stunned if it's not'

"Everyone would be stunned if it's not Ripken," another source said. "There are no tricks, no hidden mystery. Don't look for any surprises."

"No one has anything against Rip," an additonal source said. "He deserves the shot."

Ripken was bypassed when Joe Altobelli was named to replace Weaver following the 1982 season and again when Weaver was lured out of retirement by team owner Edward Bennett Williams to replace the fired Altobelli on June 14, 1985.

Altobelli had spent 14 years in the organization, and had previous experience as a major league manager with San Francisco for three seasons. Long viewed as Weaver's heir apparent, Altobelli took the job with the Giants in 1977 when it appeared Weaver would continue managing for several more years.

Altobelli directed the Orioles to the 1983 World Series championship, but when they faltered the next two seasons, Williams went back to Weaver and offered his favorite manager $500,000 to complete the 1985 season.

Weaver intended only to complete that campaign, but after the Orioles finished fourth, he was convinced they could do better and decided to manage another year.

Williams, a Washington, D.C. attorney, apparently has left the selection of a replacement this time to his baseball people, although General Manager Hank Peters has said, "A decision of this magnitude requires a joint decision."

Ripken is the father of Baltimore shortstop Cal Jr.

Communication, family important to University first lady

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

Communication is the tool which Ruth Ann Wefald says allows her to balance her positions as wife, mother and first lady of the K-State campus.

She said good communication enables her to know what is going on, and plan accordingly. However, if her family needs her, they come first, she said.

"When I was interviewed by the selection committee, I told them they could have Jon (Wefald) full time, but I would work part time," Wefald said.

"The role of a university president's wife depends on the person in that position," she said, and added that the role changes and develops with each new person's characteristics.

"Ruth Ann Wefald, as the wife of the president of K-State, will be molded by her interest, abilities and family as well. I will do those things that seem appropriate and important to help Jon and the University as a whole."

Wefald said she is particularly excited about serving as chairwoman of the steering committee to initiate the construction of an art museum on campus.

"An art museum is like the soul of a university. It is almost like a jewel that reflects what we value and stand for at K-State. It could be an asset when people are brought to our campus...it serves as an enriching experience and speaks about what is important at our University," she said.

Wefald said currently the University art collection is dispersed throughout the campus, and some of the art is stored away.

Wefald pointed out several paintings in her home which are part of the K-State collection.

"I think it is better to hang them here so visitors to our house can see them rather than having them stored away where no one can appreciate their beauty."

Wefald said the money for the museum will be raised by a special fund-raising drive.

"The first step for the committee will be to see if there is support for this project and where the support for the funds will come from," she added.

Wefald is adding academics to her list of activities by taking a course in women's studies offered on campus. She has completed undergraduate and graduate work in history and said she may begin working on a doctorate.

Although Wefald has been active in women's programs in the past, she said she will wait to get involved in the programs here at K-State. She said it is essential to listen and learn about what the programs involve.

However, Wefald said, "K-State has a very nice Women's Resource Center...I am so proud of all the women that took a stand to get these things started here."

She said she is currently attending a weekly noon luncheon titled, "The Rural Initiative," which is offered by the College of Human Ecology. She added that she has been asked in conjunction with this to speak at the November conference, "Future Rural Families in the Heartland."

Wefald said she will begin serving on the Board of Directors for the University For Man this fall.

She finds time for a little relaxation of her own every once in a while, she said. Although she spends much of her time at home at 100 Wilson Court, she can also be found at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex performing aerobic exercises along with whom she calls "those undergraduates with boundless energy." She said she prefers aerobic exercises because it gives her an overall workout.

Wefald said the biggest adjustment for her family has been living at a presidential residence on campus, which is something they have never done before.

Although she said there may be some problems involved with living on campus, especially considering her two sons, Skip, 16, and Andy, 14, she said she believes overall it will be a beneficial experience.

"It will be different because there isn't a neighborhood, but this can be overcome by making a special effort to reach out.

"The benefits include the nice University facilities which the boys use. They often go to the Union to play pool or to the Rec Center to work out," she said.

Wefald said the best part about her role as the president's wife is the opportunity to meet so many interesting people.

"I have met so many wonderful people...outstanding students and faculty. I don't think anyone who doesn't enjoy meeting people would enjoy this position."

Staff/John La Barge

Ruth Ann Wefald, wife, mother and first lady of K-State, says good communication enables her to know what is going on. Wefald said she believes "the role of a university president's wife depends on the person in that position," changing and developing with each person's characteristics.

Representatives pass 'magic act' fiscal bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House on Wednesday approved an election-year budget package that relies on accounting gimmicks, asset sales and user fees to help meet the government's self-imposed deficit limit in the fiscal year starting Oct. 1.

The measure was passed, 309-106, despite warnings by administration officials that major policy changes in the bill — including those that cut defense spending and change domestic policies — could draw a veto from President Reagan.

"We're using every possible blue-smoke-and-mirror mechanism available to us," Rep. Silvio Conte, R-Mass., complained.

Rep. Robert S. Walker, R-Pa., compared the savings in the bill to levitating an elephant. "It's a magic act. It should not be taken seriously," he said.

"Everyone acknowledges that in this package we are not solving the structural problem of the deficit," said Rep. Leon Panetta, D-Calif.

But the House Budget Committee chairman, Rep. William H. Gray III, D-Pa., said the $15.1 billion package was "the best that can be done given the political reality facing us."

Reagan has threatened to veto any substantial tax increases or cuts in military spending, insisting that deficit reduction come from cutting domestic programs, Gray said.

But, Gray added: "Everyone knows that this body is not going to vote to cut $15 billion out of domestic ... 40 days before an election."

"It's a sorry story of negatives and apologies rather than action

Committee plans Homecoming events

Skits, Union Day highlight schedule

By LORI STEVENS AND GREG BALES
Collegian Reporters

With October just around the corner, planning for Homecoming '86 has already begun for members of Blue Key and the Homecoming committee.

At a meeting Sunday in the Union Big Eight Room, Blue Key members gave information to the committee about the new rules and changes for Homecoming.

Activities scheduled for Homecoming, Oct. 20-25, are Body Building, Yell Like Hell, Pant the Chant, the parade competitions and a talent acts competition.

The first day of events, called Union Day, will begin with the hanging of spirit banners. Banners must be no larger than 4 feet by 8 feet and incorporate the Homecoming theme, "Purple Pride...The K-State Tradition." Judges will look at creativity, effective use of materials, overall appearance and generation of Wildcat spirit.

One of the most popular Homecoming events is Body Building, which will be a part of Union Day.

Human bodies are used as building blocks for creative pyramids and formations. Judges will look for enthusiasm, generation of spirit, effective use of human bodies and effective use of time and skill in execution.

Some revisions were made to ensure the safety of the participants, said Kelly Welch, Blue Key president. There haven't been any accidents yet, but judges for the event have noticed groups become a little braver each year.

"This year we are having participants sign a release," Welch said. "And more emphasis is being placed on enthusiasm and creativity."

The release will simply state that Blue Key is not liable for accidents or injuries which occur during the Body Building competition.

This year, a height restriction will go into effect, limiting formations to the height of two people. This is to prevent any accidents or injuries from occurring.

An instruction clinic will be presented by the varsity cheerleaders. Safety tips and creative ideas for improving the teams' participation will be given. An additional 5 points will be awarded to all teams that send a representative to the clinic.

As part of Union Day, there will be an introduction and short talk by head football coach Stan Parrish. In addition, some of the football players and cheerleaders will be present. The cheerleaders usually perform the fight song and a dance routine.

Also, student ambassador candidates will be introduced on Union Day. Students will have the opportunity to vote for the student ambassadors on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of Homecoming Week.

The final event of Union Day is the Yell Like Hell competition. This is a four-minute skit which is original, creative and incorporates the Homecoming theme.

A new addition to the schedule this year is called Union Day/K-State Day Talent. Five participation points will be given to each team that provides one act in between the other events. These acts can be anything from a singing group to a solo comedian act and must be performed on either Union Day or K-State Day.

K-State Day will be Thursday, Oct. 23. In the past, this took place on Friday, but Blue Key changed it to Thursday in hopes of increasing participation in the other activities. K-State Day consists of the finals from the Body Building and Yell Like Hell competitions.

The float judging, spirit march and bonfire will all be on Friday, Oct. 24. Float judging will be earlier than usually this year. The floats will be judged from 3-6 p.m. so the competing groups will not be working in the dark. The change will also allow students to participate in the spirit march that will lead to the bonfire and pep rally in Memorial Stadium.

The Homecoming parade will be Saturday of Homecoming Week. It will begin at Fifth Street and Poyntz Avenue, procede through Aggieville and end up at the City Park. The final float judging will be at this time.

But when city Forestry Foreman J. David Mattox sawed off the branch to which Andy was clinging, the branch came down and Andy climbed up.

"Marlin (Perkins) wouldn't do it this way," commented one spectator.

"If he's not caught, he could survive all winter out here," said Zoe Albers, hoofed-stock keeper at the zoo. Andy evaded capture attempts all Tuesday.

Zoo curator Caroline Meek said Andy returned to the zoo Tuesday night and again Wednesday morning.

The monkey was shot with a tranquilizer around noon and with two more around 5:30 p.m. Wednesday, but their effect was minimal.

"The monkey is so freaked out the drug won't work," Albers said.

So, Mattox again cut off the branch the monkey was hanging on, and this time both monkey and branch crashed to the ground.

The race was on.

Andy ended up in a maple tree in Hodges' west yard.

After deciding a water hose probably wouldn't do the trick, workers backed the cherry picker onto the lawn.

Meeks, climbing into the cherry picker, asked for a pair of gloves.

"He's usually good-natured," she said, "but he's got a good set of teeth."

At 6:20 p.m., another tranquilizer was administered, this one with a larger needle.

"This is the most excitement we've had since the two leopards got out," said Dick Clark, 124 S. Evergreen Ave.

Clark said in addition to the leopards, his yard had been visited by an arctic fox and "peacocks on a regular basis."

Cars lined up along Poyntz Avenue and necks craned as everyone waited to discover Andy's fate.

At 6:30, the cherry picker descended and spectators cheered as Meeks emerged with a frightened, dazed monkey.

"He took a lot of shots and the last one was with our biggest needle," she said. "That's why he's so groggy, and that's why we got him so fast."

Two hours later, Don Wixom, curator of education at the zoo, said Andy would be fine.

"I just called the zoo," he said. "It'll take him overnight to recover, but they're very resilient animals. He's none the worse for wear."

The remaining monkey, Prissy, was still not caught as of late Wednesday night.

Wixom said as far as he could determine, the monkeys had escaped through an improperly locked door.

"They're quick to eye things like that," he said.

Events

Groups can earn points on enthusiasm and participation at the parade.

The points won at all the activities and events are totaled, and the all-University spirit award is then determined. A traveling Homecoming activities trophy is awarded to the group that has earned the most points for achievement and participation.

The Homecoming football game begins at 11:30 a.m. Saturday against the Missouri Tigers. At halftime, the new ambassadors will be announced. Blue Key members are also trying to arrange a repeat performance of the first-place Body Building group either at halftime or before the game. This would allow the alumni to see one of the activities offered during Homecoming week.

Manhattan merchants will be able to have their store windows painted for $35 this year. Various campus organizations will do the painting to raise money for future Blue Key scholarships.

Though Homecoming activities are primarily designed for large living groups, Welch said anyone may participate.

"Painting windows, decorating Aggieville and the campus, participation in the parade and the Spirit March are a few things individuals not belonging to large living groups could do to get involved," Welch said.

Most organizational activities are only in the planning stages now, Welch said. But he said everyone should "start now" because of all the details that will require attention at the last minute.

Budget

and success," Rep. Willis D. Gradison Jr., R-Ohio, said of the package. "It ducks the tough choices with a ragtag collection" of asset sales and revenue enhancers that amounted to "a short-sighted plan."

The House package for bringing the fiscal 1987 deficit below the $154 billion limit in the Gramm-Rudman deficit-reduction law included:

—More than $8 billion in sales of government assets, including the Conrail freight railroad and loan portfolios.

—Nearly $8 billion in new fees, including a $1.8 billion from a 0.5 percent duty on imported merchandise that the bill calls a "Customs user fee." Income tax penalties would be increased and Internal Revenue Service enforcement efforts boosted, while timing and application of many fees would be changed to help give the government a one-year cash fix.

—Only $1.9 billion in spending reductions, including $500 million each from military and domestic programs across the board.

—Shifting $680 million in red ink from fiscal 1987 to fiscal 1986, which ends next Tuesday, by speeding up revenue-sharing payments to local governments.

—About $3.1 billion in spending, including a guarantee that Social Security recipients receive cost-of-living increases in January.

The basic package was worked out in consultation with the Republican-controlled Senate.

But the House added the across-the-board cut, helping to make its package more meaty that the Senate's $13 billion version and also satisfying liberals.

Tax

legislation that raises its income tax rates," Reagan added.

House passage would send the measure to the Senate for final concurrence, probably next week. The bill would be sent to President Reagan to be signed into law sometime in October.

The last serious threat to the bill was put down by House Republican Leader Bob Michel of Illinois, who, ironically, opposes the measure. During a rancorous GOP caucus, Michel made clear he would exercise his prerogative as leader and claim the right to make the routine motion that would send the bill back to the negotiating committee.

Michel's motion would not instruct the negotiators on what changes should be made in the bill; it would have the effect of killing the bill and, thus, no one expects it to carry.

Cups

"We spent a great deal of money working to increase the efficiency of that operation (beverage area) so customers could spend less time," Sisson said.

For example, four additional ice dispensing areas are available. She said new fast-flow valves for carbonated beverage dispensers have also been ordered. This will increase the number of valves for soft drinks from 16 to 24, she said.

She said the plastic cups also have decreased the time it takes to go through the cashier, because the cup has eliminated the need of the cashier to ask the customer which beverage the cup contains.

Sisson mentioned several advantages to the foam cups, including a lower price and a better insulating ability.

House passes tax reform legislation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives voted 292-136 Thursday for landmark legislation that would change the way most Americans pay their income taxes while shifting a big share of the burden to corporations.

The bill was hailed as the most thorough income-tax revision ever. The political breakdown: 176 Democrats and 116 Republicans voted yes; 74 Democrats and 62 Republicans voted no, with many of them expressing concern about the bill's impact on an economy plagued by sluggish growth.

The margin of victory for the measure was more overwhelming than even its staunchest supporters had predicted. Some had forecast it would pass by 30 to 50 votes.

Final Senate approval is expected by the end of next week, and the legislation would then be sent to President Reagan for his signature. Officials have indicated the president tentatively plans a ceremonial signing, likely the week of Oct. 5. That would mark the end of a two-year fight for an issue that Reagan put at the top of his second-term agenda.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes said Reagan "welcomes today's vote by the House."

"The country is now only one vote away in the Senate from enacting the president's number one domestic priority — a tax system that will promote economic growth, simplify tax returns for the vast majority of Americans, return the code to a promise of fairness and equity, and most important of all, reduce rates for most Americans," Speakes said.

Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., a chief author of the bill, said, "We are going to let the American people know that their legislative process is working, that when they request of their leaders in Washington a change, that we respond."

The legislation, he added, responds to a public demand "that the family down the street or the corporation across town can't beat the system any longer."

"We must not pass up this historic opportunity to make a contribution to those elements of the American economy that have long been neglected: the working poor, the family, labor and capital," said Rep. Jack F. Kemp, R-N.Y.

"This is the most sweeping tax-reform legislation in the history of this nation," Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, D-Mass., said in closing the debate. "If we pass this bill, the 99th Congress will assume a special place in the history of this country."

Within moments of the bill's passage, Rostenkowski strode to his office and hanged a "Gone Fishin" sign on the door.

The bill would cut individual and corporate tax rates deeply and eliminate or reduce several deductions and exclusions, including those for Individual Retirement Accounts, consumer interest and sales taxes. On the average, individual taxes would be cut about 6.1 percent — less than $4 a week — and more than 6 million working poor would be dropped from the tax rolls. Several million couples and individuals would face tax increases.

Over the next five years, corporations would pay a $120-billion greater share of the tax burden and business would lose a major incentive for job-creating investments — changes that worry some lawmakers and economists.

Members of both parties spoke against the measure — expressing fears that it would damage an already sluggish economy, impose another burden on the middle class or destroy jobs in their districts.

The legislation, said Rep. Bill Frenzel, R-Minn., will hurt economic growth, savings, job creation, exports, U.S. competitiveness, housing, education and charity.

Rep. Bill Archer, R-Texas, added, "There is both good and bad in this bill. The risks associated with the bad outweigh hoped-for benefits of the good."

Archer tried to have the bill sent back to the Senate and House negotiators who produced the final compromise — a move that probably would have killed it. He was defeated, 268-160.

"This bill poses no threat to the economy," Rostenkowski told the House. "About the only people I haven't heard from are those people this bill does the most for — low- and

Kansans split vote on tax overhaul bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A bipartisan majority of the Kansas congressional delegation backed a proposed overhaul of the U.S. tax code on Thursday, although supporters conceded the measure was a mixed bag for taxpayers.

Two Kansas Democrats and one Republican voted for the bill, which cleared the House 292-136. The measure now goes to the Senate.

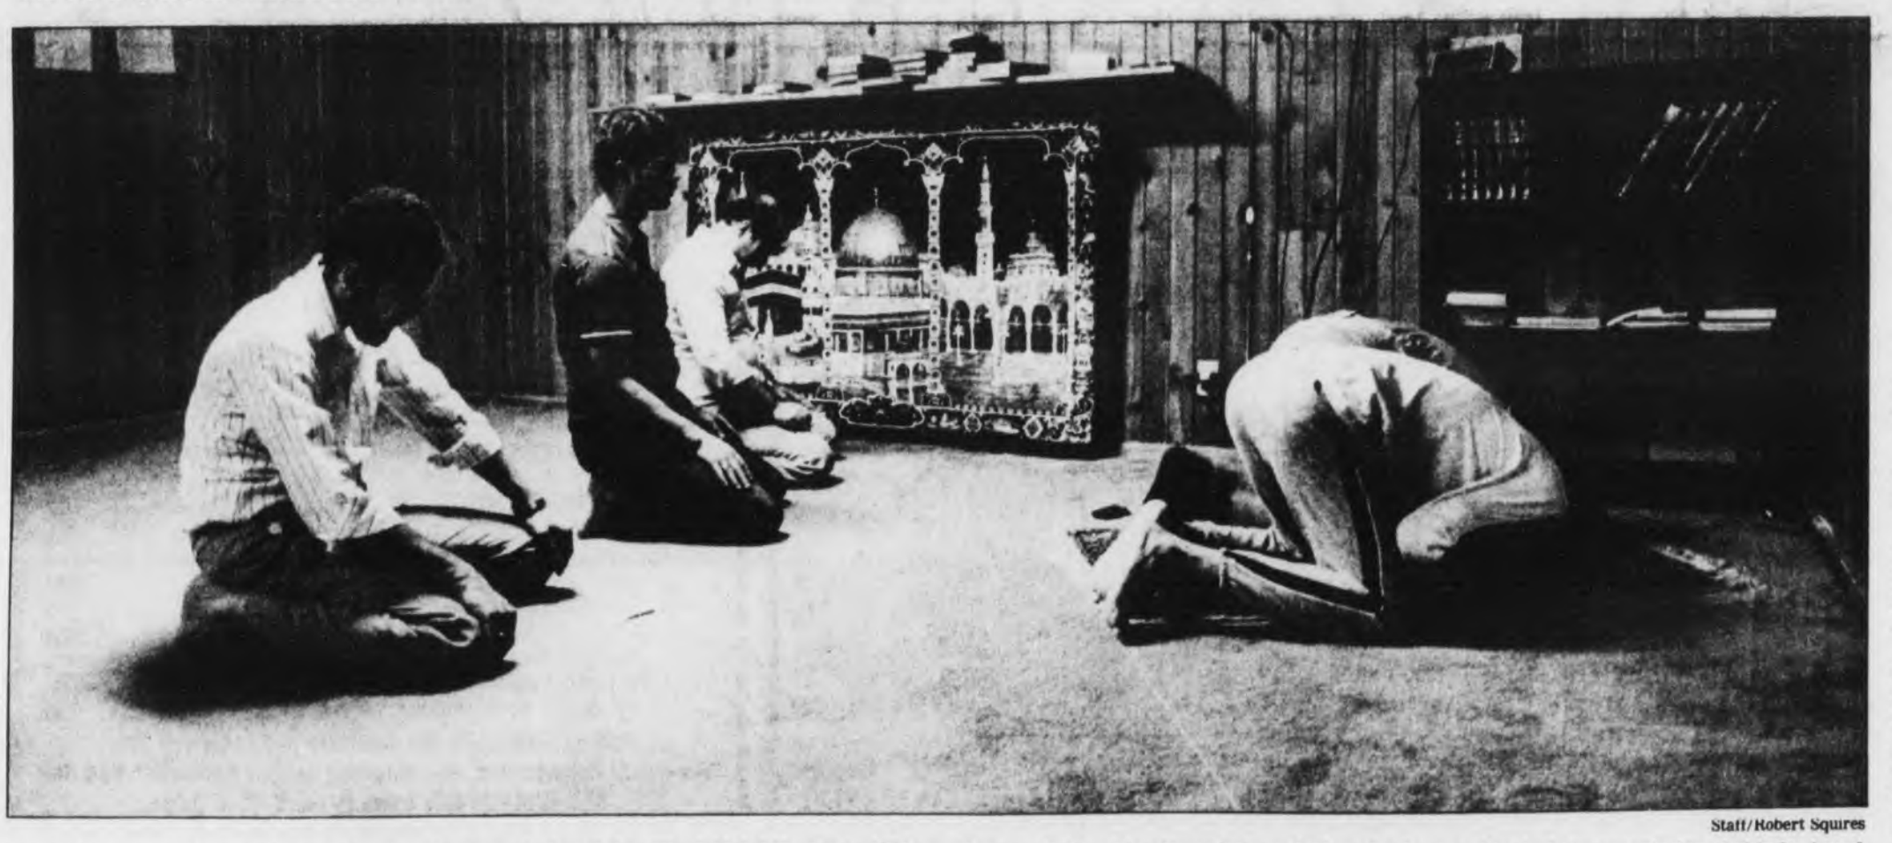
Republican Reps. Pat Roberts and Bob Whittaker voted against the measure. Supporting it were Reps. Jim Slattery, a Topeka Democrat; Dan Glickman, a Wichita Democrat; and Jan Meyers, an Overland Park Republican.

"In sum, while it is not perfect, it does make the tax code more fair and equitable, and that should serve to restore the confidence of the American people in their tax structure," Glickman said in a statement explaining his vote.

No Kansans spoke during House floor debate on the measure.

Whittaker, an Augusta Republican who represents the 5th District of southeast Kansas, said he opposed the proposal because it was "mostly bad, particularly for the farm economy."

"I've heard very little enthusiasm for this package from folks in my district," said Whittaker. "As a matter of fact, the more they know about what's in this bill, the less they like it."



In citing his objections with the proposal, Whittaker pointed to the elimination of income averaging, a provision that many farmers use to offset large fluctuations in their incomes from year to year; repeal of the investment tax credit and the "costly grab bag of tax breaks for special interests."

Roberts, who represents the 1st District of western Kansas, earlier in the week called the proposal a "recipe for recession" and said it would hurt the economy in the future by discouraging saving and investment.

Meyers said she disliked several provisions in the legislation, such as the loss of the deduction for consumer interest and restrictions on individual retirement accounts, but generally thought the bill was good for most taxpayers.

"Overall, I think it's a fairer bill than the tax code we have now," she said.

Slattery, a Topeka Democrat, said taxpayers in northeast Kansas should benefit and he praised provisions to impose a minimum tax on corporations. He and other supporters also applauded the legislation for trying to remove tax considerations as an element in business decisions.

House serves Moslem need for worship

The big, blue building at the corner of Anderson and Sunset avenues is more than just another house on the block. It's a place of worship.

The house is actually a mosque, a place of public worship for those adhering to the Islamic faith — Moslems.

Beyond being a place of worship, the mosque, 619 Sunset Ave., is the center of Manhattan's Moslem community, said Samy Aly, adviser for K-State's Muslim Community Association.

The mosque was bought in 1983 by the association through donations from Moslems in the United States and abroad. It was established so the Manhattan community could have a place where Moslems could gather to pray and to study the teachings of Islam, Aly said. In addition, the mosque is a site for social gatherings of the Moslem com-

Enrollment sees rise; University draws 60

By TERESA TEMME

Fall enrollment increased by 60 students over last year's figures, bringing a halt to the downward slide of previous semesters, University officials announced Thursday.

As of Monday, the 20th day of classes, the official enrollment was 17,630 which is an increase from last year's 17,570, said Don Foster, University registrar.

University President Jon Wefald said the figures "show we have indeed been able to stabilize our enrollment."

"This will give us a solid base on which to build as we increase our efforts to provide the best education possible to even greater numbers of Kansans," he said.

The University's freshman class has increased 2.3 percent compared to last year, and the number of graduate students is up 8.2 percent from last year, the report said.

"The figures seem to indicate we are continuing to attract more graduating Kansas high school students than any other college or university," said Cy Wainscott, acting director of University Relations.

K-State's enrollment figures, however, are overshadowed by the University of Kansas' record 4.1 percent increase. This increase has prompted Chancellor Gene Budig to renew his plea for increased educational aid from the Kansas Legislature.

KU's enrollment on the 20th day of classes was 28,259 students. This includes all students on the Lawrence campus, the KU Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan., and in off-campus programs.

The 20th-day figures are used to determine how much state aid is granted to each university.

KU officials said the Lawrence campus has continued to attract more and more out-of-state students.

University prepares coliseum contracts

Low bids allow addition of alternates

By SCOT SANDLIN
Collegian Reporter

The University will extend contracts to the lowest bidder for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum and has approved seven of the eight added features.

The coliseum project was bid Tuesday in Topeka, with contracting bids totaling $14,535,249. This figure is $1,387,751 below the construction budget of $15,923,000.

Low bidders to whom contracts will be extended are J.E. Dunn, Kansas City, Mo., general contract; Linder & Associates Electrical Contractors, Wichita, electrical contract; and Young's Inc., Topeka, mechanical contract.

Charles Hein, acting director for the coliseum, said the date for extension of the contracts, which will officially be extended by the Purchasing Division of the Department of Administration of Kansas, has not been determined.

Because the total bid for the project is under the construction budget, alternative features can be added to the coliseum. Hein said the University has decided to add seven of these.

A north annex, a south annex, a fluted wall along the concourse, 48-foot stage curtains, concrete aprons for east and west parking areas, flagpoles with lights and a device to lower the lighting from the ceiling are the features that will now be included in the coliseum.

The total cost of the seven features is $857,465. The other half million will be used as a safeguard against unexpected costs, Hein said.

"I couldn't be more pleased. This will really make it (the coliseum) first class," Hein said. "In terms of features and capabilities it gives us an advantage over other arenas. These things are going to make it much more than just a basketball facility. There won't be one in the Big Eight that is comparable."

The south annex will include a number of offices for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and the coliseum management. It will also have storage areas, room for the press, film areas and ticket offices.

The north annex will have a hospitality room and places to entertain guests. The hospitality room will look out at the football field.

Hein said the fluted block wall along the inside of the arena will be attractive and add warmth to the building. The stones in the wall will make the atmosphere more pleasant, he said.

Three lighted flagpoles outside the arena and the concrete paving aprons should make the coliseum a more dynamic facility, he said.

The stage curtains are 48-feet high and will be used for entertainment programs performed in the structure. The original plan was to have 24-foot high curtains, Hein said, but a consultant felt the 48-foot curtains were better suited to the needs of a multi-purpose facility.

The device that lowers the lights from the ceiling will make it much easier to change the bulbs and will increase efficiency, Hein said.

The eighth alternative feature, retractable seating, was "determined to not be cost-effective at the quoted price," Hein said. Dunn's bid on the retractable seating was $120,600.

"We are going to visit with the contractor to see if he'll hold the price so we can possibly do it later," Hein said.

Hein said the retractable seating, which would be on one side of the arena, would increase floor square footage by about 2,400 feet when folded up.

The coliseum's total cost is $17,520,500. The difference between the total cost and the constructon bid is in the architect fees, contingency fees, cost of drawings, legal fees and soil tests.

Hein said all pledges still must be collected in order to pay for the facility. He said he does not want people to get the idea that the additional features mean everything is paid for.

Hein also praised the students for their efforts and contribution.

"The students took the initiative and that is why the project has gotten off the ground," he said.

A groundbreaking ceremony is scheduled for 10 a.m. Oct. 18 at the coliseum site, directly south of KSU Stadium. The ceremony will begin with a performance from the K-State band and the master of ceremonies will be Art Loub, director of KSU Foundation.

Guest speakers will include Fred Bramlage; Athletic Director Larry Travis; University President Jon Wefald, Student Body President Steven Johnson; and George Miller, vice president for administration and finance. The ceremony will last about an hour and will precede the K-State-University of Kansas foot-

Schultz, Soviets discuss Daniloff

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary of State George P. Shultz held a third meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze on Thursday after saying the two sides were finding it difficult to reach an agreement to free American reporter Nicholas Daniloff.

The unannounced 90-minute session was held at the U.S. mission to the United Nations. Shevardnadze drove off without making any statement and Shultz waved off reporters' questions when he left a few minutes later.

"We would like to get the case resolved on a satisfactory basis," Shultz told a news conference before the meeting with Shevardnadze.

"So we are working hard to see that this is done," Shultz said. He cautioned that "that doesn't mean we are going to succeed."

Shultz said Shevaradnadze also apparently "is trying to get it done" and there was "a genuine effort on both sides."

Shultz declined to discuss details of the negotiations and would not predict when Daniloff might be released.

"I don't know," Shultz said. "The sooner the better."

The meeting, like two previous ones on Tuesday, was unscheduled.

Grain elevator finds wheat missing

TOPEKA — The state Grain Inspection Department has taken over the McKain Grain Co. elevator at Delphos in receivership after 243,000 bushels of wheat were discovered to be missing during a routine inspection earlier this month, Director Marvin Webb said Thursday.

Webb said the Kansas Bureau of Investigation is continuing to investigate, trying to determine what happened to the wheat.

"We don't know what happened to the grain," Webb said. "It isn't one of those cases where it's very evident what happened."

He said the shortage was discovered Sept. 3 and the state agency became receiver of the elevator Sept. 16.

"Since that time, we've been trying to nail it down," Webb said. "It's hard to lose that amount (of wheat) in the current year."

Kansas' jobless rate stays constant

TOPEKA — Kansas' unemployment rate remained unchanged at 5.3 percent between July and August, the state Department of Human Resources reported Thursday.

The number of both employed and unemployed workers declined in the state last month, the agency said, because of the loss of seasonal farm jobs. Farm workers who drop out of the labor market when those seasonal jobs end are not counted as unemployed, the department's monthly report said.

Losses of another 300 permanent jobs in the oil and gas industry was offset by a temporary rise in the number of state and local government workers employed for the August primary election, the report said.

The number of people with jobs declined from 1,186,217 in July to 1,171,787 in August, while the number without work dropped from 66,581 to 65,270 — keeping the jobless rate at 5.3 percent.

House passes largest spending bill

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives on Thursday narrowly approved $562 billion in spending authority for federal agencies in the new budget year, the largest sum ever crammed into a single money bill.

The measure was passed 201-200 and sent to the Senate despite the threat of a veto by President Reagan. Virtually every facet of government spending for the new fiscal year starting Oct. 1 was wrapped into a single, giant package.

"We put all our eggs in this one basket," said Rep. Trent Lott of Mississippi, the House Republican whip. He called it the "Bloated Omnibus Money Bill — or BOMB for short, which is just what's going to happen to it when it gets to the White House."

Congress, with only a week to go before the current year runs out, has turned to a single, full-year package after failing to complete action on any of 13 regular appropriations bills needed for government operations.

Without authority to spend their allotments of funds, federal agencies could be forced to close down next Wednesday, Oct. 1, the first day of fiscal 1987.

Lawmakers criticize FAA inquiry

WASHINGTON — Congressional critics charged the Federal Aviation Administration Thursday with "bureaucratic footdragging...and turf-guarding" in failing to have moved quickly to require collision avoidance systems in commercial aircraft.

"We are here to find out why it has taken nearly three decades to develop a piece of equipment that could save lives, and why the use of such equipment was not long ago made mandatory," declared Rep. James L. Obserstar, D-Minn., in opening hearings on the longstanding collision avoidance controversy.

The hearings came a week after the Federal Aviation Administration said it plans to propose a regulation next year that would require commercial jetliners to be equipped with devices that warn pilots of nearby aircraft.

The FAA and industry have for more than 20 years searched for ways to warn pilots of an impending collision. The effort gained renewed attention after the Aug. 31 collision of a private plane and a Mexican jetliner over Cerritos, Calif. At least 81 people were killed.

NASA reveals space station plans

WASHINGTON — NASA officials unveiled a new plan on Thursday that would require 17 space shuttle flights to assemble a space station, beginning in 1993 and finishing in 1994.

The new design uses four pressurized chambers to connect the station's living quarters with laboratories and other modules.

As he presented the design to Congress, Administrator James C. Fletcher also outlined a new management plan that would keep all station production work dealing with the manned aspects of the station in Houston.

Texas congressmen had been up in arms over the previous proposal that would have shifted about 1,900 prospective jobs from Houston to the Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, Ala. Their protests caused Fletcher to put the program on hold for 90 days for a review.

Tour focuses on farm management

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

Managing a farm or ranch in today's struggling economy was the topic of the 12th Annual Governor's Farm and Ranch Field Day, Thursday.

The tour, sponsored by the Riley, Geary, and Clay county Farm Bureaus, began at 8:30 a.m. at the Manhattan Holidome, where about 75 area farmers and agriculture specialists boarded buses.

The tour's first stop was River Creek Farms, located northeast of Manhattan, which is owned and operated by Harold and Jeanne Mertz.

Harold Mertz concentrates on crop production. Corn, milo, and alfalfa are raised to feed livestock; wheat and soybeans for cash crops. All the crops are raised on 2,000 acres, which the family corporation both rents and leases.

Joe Mertz, the couple's son, is in charge of livestock on the farm. The corporation runs a Simmental cow herd as well as steers, which are fed until ready for market. In the winter month's, feeder lambs are purchased and fed until market time.

River Creek Farms has been in the family since 1900.

The second scheduled stop was Britt's Garden Acres between Manhattan and Ogden.

At this location, Richard and Barbra Britt operate a vegetable farm with 50 different garden crops which are sold direct to the public through a retail market. In addition to the on-site sales, the majority of their crops go to wholesale customers in a seven-state area. The Britt's also run a large cow and calf herd which provides diversification.

The tour then continued on to the Roesler Diary farm in Geary County. The farm is a Grade A diary, with the original farm homesteaded in the 1860s.

Farm operators Otto and Rose Mary Roesler are the recipients of three awards from the Kansas Dairy Herd Improvement Association.

The Ascher Farm in Geary County was next on the tour. Merle and Betty Ascher and sons operate the crop and livestock operation. Their farm includes row crops, hay, and a Charlois-Hereford crossbred cow herd. In addition to their own operation, the Ascher's do custom farming for two neighbors.

The last two stops on the tour were Gilbert Grain Inc., operated by Ron and Gary Gilbert; and the Key Milling Company, both in Clay County. Following these stops, the tour ended at 7 p.m. in Clay Center.

Student Senate alters constitution to revise representation procedure

By DARLA RYAN
Collegian Reporter

After being debated, amended and debated again, the Student Senate constitutional revision on student representation was approved last night at the senate meeting.

The original bill proposed to include all part-time students when calculating the number of senators each college receives. Currently, each college receives one senator for every 300 full-time students. The new bill was to include part-time students in that 300.

The amendment, which changed the bill to read, one senator for every 300 full-time students and every 600 part-time students, was sponsored by Jennifer Leeds, sophomore in political science.

"I feel full-time students will be discriminated against by representing the same as part-time students," she said.

Currently, part-time students pay between half and the full amount of "special fees." Student senate plays a major role in determining how these fees are spent.

Susan Baird, senior in journalism and mass communications, opposed the amendment.

"We want representation because they are people, not because they're full-time or part-time. All human beings deserve equal representation," Baird said.

Brett Bromich, senior in business administration, also opposed the amendment.

"You can't limit what a part-time student can do just because he pays part of the money," he said.

However, a majority of the senators did not agree and the amendment passed.

"If I pay twice as much money, I want twice as much to say," said Mike Riley, senior in political science, in favor of the amendment.

Although the amended bill was approved by the senate, it must still be approved by six of the nine college councils.

Senate also approved a bill requiring a senator to represent only the college or school in which he or she is enrolled. The current constitution only implies this stipulation.

Two new members were approved to sit on the Traffic Appeals Board. The new members are Manthri Srinath, senior in electrical engineering, and Roy Loepp, sophomore in milling science and management.

Steven Johnson, student body president and junior in agricultural economics, said the vacancies were due to five dishonest people on the board last year.

"Three of those (students) have graduated so there's not much we can do to them," he said. The other two were asked to step down from their positions, he said.

In other business, Johnson announced that University President Jon Wefald will start presenting a report on University drug testing and education activities to the Kansas Board of Regents twice a year.

Johnson also spoke of the upcoming football game against the University of Kansas.

"Several groups and organizations will be promoting having fun but refraining from any vandalism," he said. "Last time, we got some really bad press and we'll be closely watched this year."

Budget forces planetarium changes

By STEVEN DAVID
Collegian Reporter

Due to budget cutbacks in the Department of Physics and the loss of a key faculty member, the planetarium on top of Cardwell Hall has been forced to look for new methods of operation.

Unlike previous years, a group wishing to visit the facility now must tell the planetarium in advance so it can schedule a show, said Chander Bhalla, professor and head of the physics department.

Ted Stalec, who was the director of the planetarium, left the University in 1983. Fifty percent of Stalec's job was giving shows and running the planetarium. When he left, he was never replaced, Bhalla said.

Bhalla said Stalec thoroughly enjoyed giving shows. Stalec put a lot of his own time into shows simply because he liked to do it.

"What Stalec did was beyond the call of duty," he said. "It would be hard to find another person like that."

The planetarium has no real budget. The money needed for the planetarium comes through the physics department, he said. The department buys items such as films, slides and other equipment as they are needed. The department consults people who are familier with such equipment and buys it according to its helpfulness to astronomy and the general public, Bhalla said.

The planetarium is 30 years old and is used mainly for teaching astronomy to University students. It also functions as good public relations for the department and the University, he said. There has never been an admission charge to the planetarium which has not had exclusive funding for 20 years.

The planetarium "helps K-State provide a good image," Bhalla said. It helps in recruiting students and lets them and the public know that K-State and the department are first-rate institutions, Bhalla said.

The physics department has two faculty members active in astronomy: Ted Geisert, who helps promote the University through astronomy with the aid of a mobile telescope, and David Lien, the new astronomy teacher who helps with the planetarium, Bhalla said.

Also helping with the planetarium are some tested undergraduate students. The faculty members are not compensated for their extra work in the planetarium, but the undergraduate students are reimbursed for the effort they give, he said.

"When we have the manpower and can pay them, we are more than happy to give a show," Bhalla said.

"Because the money and manpower are limited, those groups wishing to see a show must make their plans in advance. The groups can't just come in when they want anymore.

"If it's feasible, we will never close the planetarium to the public," he said.

Campus street fixing shows poor planning

Let's talk tar.

The latest in poorly planned University improvements is the repaving of Mid-Campus Drive, the main campus thoroughfare.

Talk about timing.

It is a struggle to arrive at any sensible reason why the resurfacing is being done now, during a peak time of motor and pedestrian traffic. It should have been done during the summer, when the population of campus is less than half of what it is in the fall.

Members of the campus community are now challenged daily with dodging steamrollers and trucks spreading asphalt. As they gingerly tiptoe across the street the warm asphalt gives just a little, and workmen cringe at the thought of spike heels gouging their progress.

Workmen must contend with the possibility of on-foot traffic ruining the surface. Wednesday an individual with a "don't you dare" attitude was charged with the responsibility of keeping people from walking across any fresh pavement.

Those who do make it across the street unscathed carry with them a gooey mess of asphalt stuck to their shoes. A gooey mess which was transferred to the floors of the K-State Union, (our new purple welcome mats are ruined!) Kedzie Hall and Calvin Hall.

Removing this tar is no mop-and-go matter. The goo has to be scrubbed off — by hand.

Mid-Campus Drive has needed repair for a couple of years — ample time to determine the most efficient way to complete the task while inconveniencing the fewest number of people.

House must support raising 55 mph limit

For 12 years, the majority of motorists traveling Interstate 70 from Kansas City to Denver has not been obeying the law.

In 1974, Congress set the national speed limit at 55 mph. The average motorist in Kansas travels faster than that limit. The average is raised considerably by travelers on interstates 135 and 70.

Soon, however, those motorists may be traveling legally if legislation raising the national speed limit to 65 mph on rural interstates passes the House as easily as it passed in Senate Tuesday.

Proponents of raising the speed limit called the bill a matter of states' rights. Senators from states west of the Mississippi River heavily favored the legislation with good reason.

Travel is different concept in the West where in many states public transportation is not extensive and population is sparse. Residents think nothing of traveling more than 100 miles every time their children play in a high school football game, or driving 20 miles to pick up groceries. Opponents of the bill who say a higher speed limit would only save travelers "a few minutes here and there" have never traveled west of Salina.

Motorists traveling long distances through these sparsely settled areas on interstates find the less-scenic areas incredibly dull. Even well-meaning travelers find their speedometers sliding to the right.

Statistics prove that highway fatalities dropped 15 percent after the 55 mph speed limit was imposed. However, the bill only allows the limit to be raised on rural interstates. Interstates were designed as a part of the national defense system to provide quick interior transport. On the four-lane interstates outside of city limits, 65 mph is a safe and reasonable speed.

In addition, the 55 mph speed limit makes law enforcement personnel spend time enforcing the law so the state can receive federal highway funds when they could be performing other public service duties.

States should have the right to determine the speed limit on interstates passing within their borders. States with dangerous terrain or heavy traffic should keep the speed limit at 55 mph, but states such as Kansas should have the right to set the limit higher.

A similar bill was defeated in the House last month. When the Senate's version goes to the House, legislators should support the change, and make the average traveler a law-abiding citizen.

'Poison' could prove damaging to children

Dior's Poison may be a killer.

Christian Dior is now marketing in the United States a new fragrance called Poison. It is currently the No. 1 selling perfume in Europe.

The cost of the perfume — $150 for 1.7 ounces — could climb much higher when considering the name chosen for the product.

If the perfume becomes as successful as the current buying rate indicates, it won't be long until hundreds of thousands of young mothers Poison themselves daily.

Poison is — according to Webster's — a substance causing illness or death when eaten, drunk or absorbed even in relatively small quantities.

But this is just a group of words to a child who just might be able to put P-O-I-S-O-N together when exploring kitchen cabinets and remember the inscription on mother's sweet-smelling perfume.

Corporations have the responsibility to consider the impact of product design and packaging on those outside their target audience.

Students' behavior baffles children

Editor's note: The following letters are only a few written by students in Jan Gibbs' fifth-grade class at Lee School, 701 Lee St., in response to Jean Teller's column, "Students neglect common courtesy," in the Sept. 12 Collegian.

Editor,

Our teacher Jane Gibbs read your article about "Students neglect common courtesy." And I agree with your letter because I live by college students and they party every Saturday and you cannot get any rest. I really do agree with your letter very much.

Sincerely,
Selena Graham

Editor,

Our teacher, Mrs. Gibbs, read us your article. I thought it was good. I agree that everybody should remember their manners no matter how old they are. Here, at Lee, we respect other classes by walking quietly. Sometimes we forget though. This was my opinion on Jean Teller's article.

Sincerely,
Kathy Kim

Editor,

Our class read Jean Teller's article "Students neglect common courtesy," and I think that she is right. They should be more polite and well-mannered. Some are and some aren't. That's too bad, because our class is one of the best.

Sincerely,
Brook Bailey

Editor,

I read Jean Teller's article in the newspaper, and I think she is perfectly right. "Students neglect common courtesy" was the name of the article. She's perfectly right about how they act, and how they should act. I think that they should act better in classes, and respect others. Even though they are away from home they should mind their manners. I'm in fifth grade and the people in my class act better.

Sincerely,
Diana Skalitzky

Editor,

Our teacher, Jan Gibbs, read Jean Teller's article. I hope you college students read it too. My dad is an older college student. He enforces manners. Also in grade school we, the kids, have to not talk in the halls. If you have gone to Lee School all your life you learn to do that on your own.

Sincerely,
Kristen Reed

Editor,

We read Jean Teller's article about common courtesy. I think you are right. So I made up some common courtesy things, and here they are: No running in the halls, raise your hand before talking, turn in work on time, study, respect other people's things, make sure have done all you can on assignments, be quiet in the halls, no unnecessary noises, and respect older adults.

Sincerely,
Daniel Wimberley

Editor,

Mrs. Gibbs, my fifth grade teacher, read Jean Teller's article, "Students neglect common courtesy." I agree with her. I have a couple of college friends and when I go to visit them I don't see any manners being displayed. People with big boxes stand in front of the elevator all day because they can't see the button. Now who is going to help this poor person? Nobody! I get really disgusted when I see things like this happen. I wish students would use some manners!

Sincerely,
Amy Bartel

Editor,

Our teacher read Jean Teller's article, "Students neglect common courtesy." I think college kids should not talk loud in the halls and not have wild parties except for the Homecoming game.

Sincerely,
Michael Hart

Editor,

I think that Jean Teller is right. I live right across the street from a university. And every month I have toilet paper in my yard, that is not right. They should behave.

Sincerely,
Carol Davison

Editor,

I agree with Jean Teller. My brother is a senior in high school. I hope he has common courtesy.

Sincerely
Jimmy A. Seymour

Editor,

We read Jean Teller's article, "Students neglect common courtesy." I want to add some more things. College kids should talk right, eat right, dress right, act right.

Here at school most of us kids do a lot of good-mannered stuff like no talking in the halls. We don't litter very much, so thank you. I like what you said.

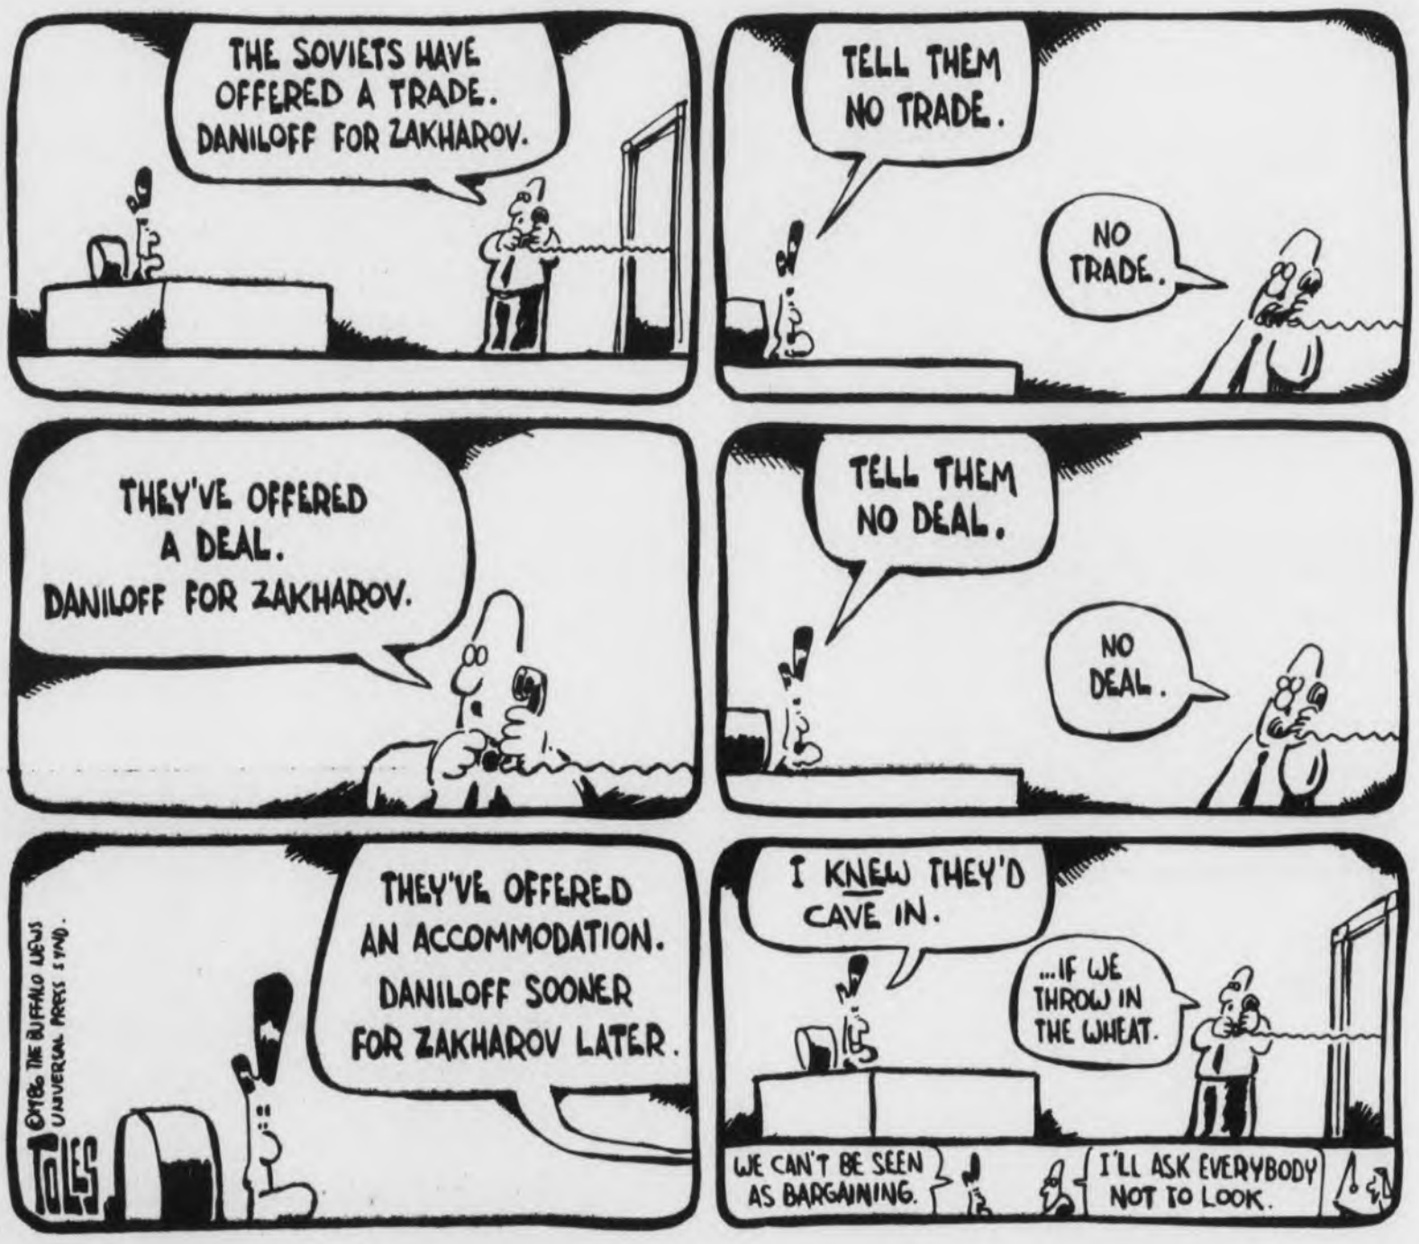
Your unknown friend,
Josh Brown

Editor,

Our teacher read Jean Teller's article about common courtesy. I agree with the letter very much. I know because I live near K-State and many times I am told to go pick cans and paper up in the yard. I think the students should use some common sense sometimes. Also in big buildings they should be quiet. I respect your article.

Sincerely
Jana Franz

Editor,



Here's more suggestions for students:

— Don't spit food at people.

— Don't talk, spit, or laugh with food in your mouth.

— Don't blow your nose on your sleeve. I hope these suggestions help students in the future.

Sincerely,
Josh Myers

People watching extends education

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

One of my favorite pastimes is people watching.

It doesn't make any difference where I am or what else is going on; as long as there are people to watch, I'm happy. It's very hard to become bored while observing my fellow humans.

Airports, restaurants, shopping malls and the Union are among the better places to people watch. Walking across campus can be an experience in itself (and not just because of the street construction).

Next time you begin your trek across campus, take time to lift your head and watch the people you pass. It's amazing how diverse yet similar we are. I never tire of seeing the faces, the shapes, the clothes, the hair styles or the groups on a college campus.

Coming from a relatively small city in northwest Kansas, I find the fashions particularly fascinating. I am not exactly a conformist with my own fashion statements but, believe me, I wouldn't be caught dead in some of the outfits I see on this campus. The No. 1 reason is that I would look like a circus sideshow freak in them.

My mother is an artist with very definite ideas on color, shapes and perspective. A lot of that must be genetic because I find I still cannot mix gold and silver jewelry, plaids with stripes, or shades of colors that are not remotely similar. (I also have an aversion to "Jams," but I think that's just because I know how awful I would look wearing them.)

Don't get me wrong. If you like wearing whatever, go right ahead. I just hope there doesn't come a day when we all wear the same style because that wouldn't work.

The same goes for hair styles. The "new wave" and "punk" styles are certainly interesting but not for everyone.

What about faces and shapes of people? The way we look is as unique as each individual — so why do so many of us try to look like everyone else? We try to wear the same clothes, the same hairstyles. Even the formerly non-conformist style of men piercing their ears is becoming a means of looking like everyone else.

This is where the part about watching groups comes in.

It's fairly easy to spot the people belonging to a certain group because they all dress, talk and act alike. It's a shame because each one of us is so unique we really ought to stay that way. Why do we feel we have to look like everyone else to belong?

People watching isn't an easy sport. It's long, hard work and it does require some thought. You can't just observe and not make notations on those observations.

The group effect is one of those notations. You can also note behavior and emotions from watching people.

A character in a book I read this summer (no, it wasn't a prize winning novel) would make up stories about people standing in line at the grocery store. The scenario she made up about the gentleman standing behind her with a bottle of wine and notepad was that he had decided to dump a girlfriend. The bottle of wine was to not only drown his own sorrow but to also help him with writing the "Dear Jane" letter on the notepad.

Naturally, her assumptions were all wrong. But it is fun to make up stories or try to guess someone's past from his or her current behavior. I've been able to figure out a person's personality and quirks just by watching them.

I'm a great believer in watching. It seems to be a good way of getting to know people and also of getting to know myself. I'm much more aware of my own behavior and actions after watching others.

If you have an hour or two sometime, sit in the Union or on one of the benches on campus and observe your fellow human beings. Make sure you note the fashions, hairstyles and behavior of the rest of us. Be sure to think about what and whom you are observing. The conformists and non-conformists, the old and the young, the thin and "pleasingly plump," the social animals and the loners, we're all different and yet all the same.

Center aids students with job information

By ANN CLIFFORD
Collegian Reporter

If students are willing to take the time and trouble, they "can create their own opportunities" in the job market, the director of the Career Planning and Placement Center said.

Director Bruce Laughlin said employers like to hire people who take the time to seek information on their own. He said students should take full and early advantage of the job search services available through the center.

The majority of the services provided by the center are directed at graduating seniors. Laughlin said the purpose of the center is to help students assess themselves and "solicit the attention of prospective employers."

Laughlin said students should not be looking for just a job but the appropriate job. The first step in finding the right job is self-evaluation and indentification of what a person wants from a career.

During the process of self-evaluation, students should begin to familiarize themselves with the center, Laughlin said. They should become familiar with the layout of the center, its personnel and the available resources.

The career library and the audio-visual resources at the center, located in Holtz Hall, provide information on topics such as career exploration, best job location, job search strategy, resume writing and interviewing. Students can also receive individual help from career center personnel, Laughlin said.

To be eligible for on-campus interviews and the job search services provided by the center, students must register by filling out the necessary forms. Students graduating in December, May or after summer school should register as soon as possible, Laughlin said.

Students who will be participating in on-campus interviews can register by completing data sheets. The data sheets provide a standardized form to the interviewers so they can spend more time talking to the student and less time studying the background information, he said.

Students interested in jobs that do not have on-campus interviews register with the center by preparing a resume to be kept on file there.

Laughlin said these students are given help and ideas about their job searches and resumes, but an effort is made to "ensure that the student is always in control of what he is presenting to employers."

The center makes an effort to inform all graduating seniors about its services through orientation meetings in the fall. He said approximately 50 percent of the graduating students actively use the services provided by the center and many more use the resource material.

Water exercise lessens pain of arthritis

Participants find therapy enjoyable

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Senior citizens in Manhattan are using water exercises to soothe the pain of arthritis and improve flexibility and muscular strength while enjoying social and physical activity.

"Water soothes the joint, relaxes it, and the body part is lighter in the water which makes it easier to move," said Barbara Janssen, an instructor in the Arthritis Aqua Exercise Program.

The exercises are performed in the water with a slow and steady rhythm. There are approximately 40 students in the Manhattan program.

Students stand in water at shoulder height so the joints will be underwater. None of the exercises require the student to get his or her head under the water. This way, Janssen said swimmers and non-swimmers can feel comfortable in the water.

Clorene Reling, 70, student of the class and retired account clerk for K-State, said she was afraid of water before taking the class. She said she is no longer afraid of the water and thinks the class is great because a person doesn't need to know how to swim.

The water exercises work all of the joints in the body through simple repetitive movements. Students are encouraged to go at their own pace so they don't strain themselves.

"You can use joints without any injury and you feel so much better afterwards," Reling said.

As the joints become stronger and more flexible, the students will use Frisbees and inner tubes as added resistance while performing the exercises.

"I think it's the most wonderful thing that ever happened to Manhattan," Reling said. "I highly recommend it to everyone. I hope people keep interested enough to keep it going."

Enell Foerster and Janssen started teaching the class after Reling encouraged them to get certified to teach it. Both attended classes sponsored by the Arthritis Foundation and the YMCA in Wichita.

Prerequisites for the class were to either have Advanced Life Saving or be a qualified Water Safety Instructor.

"I enjoy teaching very much. It's just in the last few years I started working with senior citizens," said Foerster who has had her Water Safety Instructor cetification for 22 years.

"I knew there was a need for a program specifically for people with arthritis," said Janssen who has had her WSI certificate for eight years.

The program was developed on the West Coast about 10 years ago. Topeka has had a program for six or seven years, but the class is new in Manhattan, Janssen said.

Reling, who is involved with the Arthritis Fund Drive, said she had been trying to get the classes to Manhattan for about six or seven years.

She became familiar with the AAP through the Arthritis Foundation and a television program on arthritis. When Reling heard of the licensing for instructors in Wichita, she encouraged Foerster and Janssen to go.

After their training, Foerster and Janssen started a pilot class at K-State in June 1986. The class was well-received, so they plan on offering the class year round.

Janssen said she forsees training more teachers so they can have more classes.

Each instructor has two students from the adaptive physical education class to assist them with students in the AAP.

The classes are open to people with arthritis and people who need therapy on joints. No permission is required to join the class unless the joints are severely deteriorated or injured. If so, a doctor's permission must be granted for the student to join.

So far, doctors whose patients have wanted to join the class have encouraged them to do so.

Foerster said she hopes that with more publicity, doctors will encourage students to join the class on their own accord.

Europeans step up search for terrorists

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The 12-nation Common Market agreed Thursday to step up its fight against terrorism by intensifying the search for possible terrorist leaders and improving communications among European police forces.

The four-hour emergency meeting of European interior and justice ministers was requested by West Germany and France. Five bomb attacks in Paris earlier this month killed nine people and wounded more than 160.

The ministers said in a communique they decided to "target the major leaders and organizers" of terrorism and to install a new system of "speedy and secure" police communications.

"Terrorists, by their choice of method, are not warriors, but criminals, and must be treated as such," declared Douglas Hurd, the British home secretary who chaired the meeting.

He told a news conference the Common Market "reaffirmed its determination not to make concessions to terrorists."

Robert Pandraud, France's deputy interior minister in charge of security, said he went into the meeting "feeling optimistic concerning the results of our cooperation and my optimism was justified."

He said France would make no concession to terrorism.

"We will not give in to blackmail. Blackmail simply leads to more blackmail," said Pandraud.

Center aids students with job information

By ANN CLIFFORD
Collegian Reporter

If students are willing to take the time and trouble, they "can create their own opportunities" in the job market, the director of the Career Planning and Placement Center said.

Director Bruce Laughlin said employers like to hire people who take the time to seek information on their own. He said students should take full and early advantage of the job search services available through the center.

The majority of the services provided by the center are directed at graduating seniors. Laughlin said the purpose of the center is to help students assess themselves and "solicit the attention of prospective employers."

Laughlin said students should not be looking for just a job but the appropriate job. The first step in finding the right job is self-evaluation and indentification of what a person wants from a career.

During the process of self-evaluation, students should begin to familiarize themselves with the center, Laughlin said. They should become familiar with the layout of the center, its personnel and the available resources.

The career library and the audio-visual resources at the center, located in Holtz Hall, provide information on topics such as career exploration, best job location, job search strategy, resume writing and interviewing. Students can also receive individual help from career center personnel, Laughlin said.

To be eligible for on-campus interviews and the job search services provided by the center, students must register by filling out the necessary forms. Students graduating in December, May or after summer school should register as soon as possible, Laughlin said.

Students who will be participating in on-campus interviews can register by completing data sheets. The data sheets provide a standardized form to the interviewers so they can spend more time talking to the student and less time studying the background information, he said.

Students interested in jobs that do not have on-campus interviews register with the center by preparing a resume to be kept on file there.

Laughlin said these students are given help and ideas about their job searches and resumes, but an effort is made to "ensure that the student is always in control of what he is presenting to employers."

The center makes an effort to inform all graduating seniors about its services through orientation meetings in the fall. He said approximately 50 percent of the graduating students actively use the services provided by the center and many more use the resource material.

Water exercise lessens pain of arthritis

Participants find therapy enjoyable

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Senior citizens in Manhattan are using water exercises to soothe the pain of arthritis and improve flexibility and muscular strength while enjoying social and physical activity.

"Water soothes the joint, relaxes it, and the body part is lighter in the water which makes it easier to move," said Barbara Janssen, an instructor in the Arthritis Aqua Exercise Program.

The exercises are performed in the water with a slow and steady rhythm. There are approximately 40 students in the Manhattan program.

Students stand in water at shoulder height so the joints will be underwater. None of the exercises require the student to get his or her head under the water. This way, Janssen said swimmers and non-swimmers can feel comfortable in the water.

Clorene Reling, 70, student of the class and retired account clerk for K-State, said she was afraid of water before taking the class. She said she is no longer afraid of the water and thinks the class is great because a person doesn't need to know how to swim.

The water exercises work all of the joints in the body through simple repetitive movements. Students are encouraged to go at their own pace so they don't strain themselves.

"You can use joints without any injury and you feel so much better afterwards," Reling said.

As the joints become stronger and more flexible, the students will use Frisbees and inner tubes as added resistance while performing the exercises.

"I think it's the most wonderful thing that ever happened to Manhattan," Reling said. "I highly recommend it to everyone. I hope people keep interested enough to keep it going."

Enell Foerster and Janssen started teaching the class after Reling encouraged them to get certified to teach it. Both attended classes sponsored by the Arthritis Foundation and the YMCA in Wichita.

Prerequisites for the class were to either have Advanced Life Saving or be a qualified Water Safety Instructor.

"I enjoy teaching very much. It's just in the last few years I started working with senior citizens," said Foerster who has had her Water Safety Instructor cetification for 22 years.

"I knew there was a need for a program specifically for people with arthritis," said Janssen who has had her WSI certificate for eight years.

The program was developed on the West Coast about 10 years ago. Topeka has had a program for six or seven years, but the class is new in Manhattan, Janssen said.

Reling, who is involved with the Arthritis Fund Drive, said she had been trying to get the classes to Manhattan for about six or seven years.

She became familiar with the AAP through the Arthritis Foundation and a television program on arthritis. When Reling heard of the licensing for instructors in Wichita, she encouraged Foerster and Janssen to go.

After their training, Foerster and Janssen started a pilot class at K-State in June 1986. The class was well-received, so they plan on offering the class year round.

Janssen said she forsees training more teachers so they can have more classes.

Each instructor has two students from the adaptive physical education class to assist them with students in the AAP.

The classes are open to people with arthritis and people who need therapy on joints. No permission is required to join the class unless the joints are severely deteriorated or injured. If so, a doctor's permission must be granted for the student to join.

So far, doctors whose patients have wanted to join the class have encouraged them to do so.

Foerster said she hopes that with more publicity, doctors will encourage students to join the class on their own accord.

Europeans step up search for terrorists

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The 12-nation Common Market agreed Thursday to step up its fight against terrorism by intensifying the search for possible terrorist leaders and improving communications among European police forces.

The four-hour emergency meeting of European interior and justice ministers was requested by West Germany and France. Five bomb attacks in Paris earlier this month killed nine people and wounded more than 160.

The ministers said in a communique they decided to "target the major leaders and organizers" of terrorism and to install a new system of "speedy and secure" police communications.

"Terrorists, by their choice of method, are not warriors, but criminals, and must be treated as such," declared Douglas Hurd, the British home secretary who chaired the meeting.

He told a news conference the Common Market "reaffirmed its determination not to make concessions to terrorists."

Robert Pandraud, France's deputy interior minister in charge of security, said he went into the meeting "feeling optimistic concerning the results of our cooperation and my optimism was justified."

He said France would make no concession to terrorism.

"We will not give in to blackmail. Blackmail simply leads to more blackmail," said Pandraud.

Otis Day to perform party ballads

By LAURIE FAIRBURN
Entertainment Editor

All together now:
"You know you make me wanna ———!

Given a moment for reflection, there is probably not a college student alive who wouldn't fill in the above blank with "SHOUT!"

Ever since the movie "Animal House" became a college movie classic in 1978, two songs have been party anthems: "Shout" and "Shamalama Ding Dong." And what pops into mind when "Otis, my man!" is jubilantly yelled from somewhere across the room?

Today students have the opportunity to experience the rockin' inspiration of Otis Day and the Knights live as they perform at the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity, 2021 College View. The concert, which begins at 3 p.m. with a warm-up from Broken English, is one stop in the "Toga Party Tour."

Otis Day was "born" on the movie "Animal House," but his creator, DeWayne Jessie, has melded the two so that Day has come to control his career.

Jessie was the only member of the original Animal House Band to actually sing on the soundtrack — the others lip synched. After the success of the movie Jessie was called on to perform, but couldn't because he didn't have the rights to the name. It wasn't until four years after the movie's release that he gained the right to use the name Otis Day. He formed a band of top studio musicians.

The Knights are Dennis "Low Man" Nelson, guitar; Michael "Mr. Sensitive" Henderson, bass; Jon, "Sweet 'n Low" Maxie, keyboards; and Greg "Brownie" Brown, drums. Supporting Day with backup vocals are Amelia Jessie and Gregg Hanley, both relatives of Day.

Otis Day and the Knights' performance will also include more songs from "Animal House" and some original material.

Tickets for the concert are $10. Beer and other refreshments will be served, and a stamp system will ensure only those of legal drinking age will consume alcohol.

Center aids students with job information

By ANN CLIFFORD
Collegian Reporter

If students are willing to take the time and trouble, they "can create their own opportunities" in the job market, the director of the Career Planning and Placement Center said.

Director Bruce Laughlin said employers like to hire people who take the time to seek information on their own. He said students should take full and early advantage of the job search services available through the center.

The majority of the services provided by the center are directed at graduating seniors. Laughlin said the purpose of the center is to help students assess themselves and "solicit the attention of prospective employers."

Laughlin said students should not be looking for just a job but the appropriate job. The first step in finding the right job is self-evaluation and indentification of what a person wants from a career.

During the process of self-evaluation, students should begin to familiarize themselves with the center, Laughlin said. They should become familiar with the layout of the center, its personnel and the available resources.

The career library and the audio-visual resources at the center, located in Holtz Hall, provide information on topics such as career exploration, best job location, job search strategy, resume writing and interviewing. Students can also receive individual help from career center personnel, Laughlin said.

To be eligible for on-campus interviews and the job search services provided by the center, students must register by filling out the necessary forms. Students graduating in December, May or after summer school should register as soon as possible, Laughlin said.

Students who will be participating in on-campus interviews can register by completing data sheets. The data sheets provide a standardized form to the interviewers so they can spend more time talking to the student and less time studying the background information, he said.

Students interested in jobs that do not have on-campus interviews register with the center by preparing a resume to be kept on file there.

Laughlin said these students are given help and ideas about their job searches and resumes, but an effort is made to "ensure that the student is always in control of what he is presenting to employers."

The center makes an effort to inform all graduating seniors about its services through orientation meetings in the fall. He said approximately 50 percent of the graduating students actively use the services provided by the center and many more use the resource material.

Water exercise lessens pain of arthritis

Participants find therapy enjoyable

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Senior citizens in Manhattan are using water exercises to soothe the pain of arthritis and improve flexibility and muscular strength while enjoying social and physical activity.

"Water soothes the joint, relaxes it, and the body part is lighter in the water which makes it easier to move," said Barbara Janssen, an instructor in the Arthritis Aqua Exercise Program.

The exercises are performed in the water with a slow and steady rhythm. There are approximately 40 students in the Manhattan program.

Students stand in water at shoulder height so the joints will be underwater. None of the exercises require the student to get his or her head under the water. This way, Janssen said swimmers and non-swimmers can feel comfortable in the water.

Clorene Reling, 70, student of the class and retired account clerk for K-State, said she was afraid of water before taking the class. She said she is no longer afraid of the water and thinks the class is great because a person doesn't need to know how to swim.

The water exercises work all of the joints in the body through simple repetitive movements. Students are encouraged to go at their own pace so they don't strain themselves.

"You can use joints without any injury and you feel so much better afterwards," Reling said.

As the joints become stronger and more flexible, the students will use Frisbees and inner tubes as added resistance while performing the exercises.

"I think it's the most wonderful thing that ever happened to Manhattan," Reling said. "I highly recommend it to everyone. I hope people keep interested enough to keep it going."

Enell Foerster and Janssen started teaching the class after Reling encouraged them to get certified to teach it. Both attended classes sponsored by the Arthritis Foundation and the YMCA in Wichita.

Prerequisites for the class were to either have Advanced Life Saving or be a qualified Water Safety Instructor.

"I enjoy teaching very much. It's just in the last few years I started working with senior citizens," said Foerster who has had her Water Safety Instructor cetification for 22 years.

"I knew there was a need for a program specifically for people with arthritis," said Janssen who has had her WSI certificate for eight years.

The program was developed on the West Coast about 10 years ago. Topeka has had a program for six or seven years, but the class is new in Manhattan, Janssen said.

Reling, who is involved with the Arthritis Fund Drive, said she had been trying to get the classes to Manhattan for about six or seven years.

She became familiar with the AAP through the Arthritis Foundation and a television program on arthritis. When Reling heard of the licensing for instructors in Wichita, she encouraged Foerster and Janssen to go.

After their training, Foerster and Janssen started a pilot class at K-State in June 1986. The class was well-received, so they plan on offering the class year round.

Janssen said she forsees training more teachers so they can have more classes.

Each instructor has two students from the adaptive physical education class to assist them with students in the AAP.

The classes are open to people with arthritis and people who need therapy on joints. No permission is required to join the class unless the joints are severely deteriorated or injured. If so, a doctor's permission must be granted for the student to join.

So far, doctors whose patients have wanted to join the class have encouraged them to do so.

Foerster said she hopes that with more publicity, doctors will encourage students to join the class on their own accord.

Europeans step up search for terrorists

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The 12-nation Common Market agreed Thursday to step up its fight against terrorism by intensifying the search for possible terrorist leaders and improving communications among European police forces.

The four-hour emergency meeting of European interior and justice ministers was requested by West Germany and France. Five bomb attacks in Paris earlier this month killed nine people and wounded more than 160.

The ministers said in a communique they decided to "target the major leaders and organizers" of terrorism and to install a new system of "speedy and secure" police communications.

"Terrorists, by their choice of method, are not warriors, but criminals, and must be treated as such," declared Douglas Hurd, the British home secretary who chaired the meeting.

He told a news conference the Common Market "reaffirmed its determination not to make concessions to terrorists."

Robert Pandraud, France's deputy interior minister in charge of security, said he went into the meeting "feeling optimistic concerning the results of our cooperation and my optimism was justified."

He said France would make no concession to terrorism.

"We will not give in to blackmail. Blackmail simply leads to more blackmail," said Pandraud.

"'night Mother"

"'night, Mother," a K-State Players production, is an adult drama about control. It is a play about two women, and their hopeless struggle to understand and accept the other for what she is.

To have dignity and purpose, you have to have control, Charlotte MacFarland, director of the play and instructor of speech, said.

The play shows how people can live together intimately and still not know each other.

"'night, Mother," written by Marsha Norman, winner of the Pultizer Prize for Drama in 1983, opened Thursday and continues tonight, Saturday and Oct. 1-4. Curtain is at 8 p.m. in Nichols Theatre.

Jessie, one of the main characters, feels she has lost control of her life and is contemplating suicide. Her mother offers every argument against suicide and faces every sad truth about herself and her life.

"The feeling that one has control over at least some aspects of his or her environment, actions and fate is what gives that person a sense of dignity and purpose," MacFarland said.

"'night, Mother" has a cast of two characters. Mama is played by Pat Foltz, non-degree student, and Jessie, played by Penny Cullers, senior in theater.

Mama is a survivor. She likes lots of things, but she doesn't like to think, and she ignores unhappiness, MacFarland said.

"Other than Mama being a survivor, I have nothing in common with her. Mama is 'ordinary.' She watches television, knits, marries, raises kids and then dies. She's not pathetic, and you can't feel sorry for her, because she is happy with just that," Foltz said.

"I describe Mama as Edith Bunker; she's not that dingy, but she leads that kind of life," Foltz said.

Jessie, on the other hand, is a thinker. She is in her late 30s or early 40s, and she is the "epitome of a lonely person," MacFarland said.

Jessie is quiet, introverted. She has no self confidence. She doesn't have anything she likes to do, her marriage was disastrous, her son is a criminal, but still she is very gentle, Cullers said.

"Jessie is like a cactus. In the performance, she's more like the fleshy part of the cactus. You see more of her vulnerabilities, and she's not as quiet. She grows a blossom," Cullers said.

"It shows how tragically we don't know the people we are closest to in life," MacFarland said.

In preparation for the play, both of the actresses prepared autobiographies on what they thought their character would be like, MacFarland said.

"I thought Jessie would be the person in the sixth grade who didn't get picked to be on a team," Cullers said.

"I had fun with my autobiography and described what kind of trips I thought Mama and her family probably took," Foltz said.

Other preparation for the play included lots of physical, vocal and emotional warm ups, MacFarland said.

"It takes me about a 30 minutes to get into Mama physically, emotionally and mentally. When I start putting makeup on, it's the beginning of the change, and then I spend about 30 minutes in the corner by myself, which I call 'psyching up for the game,'" Foltz said.

"'night, Mother" is the second play in Nichols to be performed in an arena setting — seating on all sides of the stage.

"This is what they call an intimate theater, because the audience is locked so closely to the characters," Foltz said.

The players in "'night, Mother" improvise the beginning. The actresses will already be on stage and talking when the audience enters the theater and at the end of the play they will stay on stage until the audience leaves, MacFarland said.

"It's almost like they (the audience) is dropping into my house, and then they go home. They get to be Peeping Toms," Foltz said.

"There is no intermission; the play keeps you continually emotionally involved," Cullers said.

In choosing the play, the speech faculty looked at the whole season, and then tried to balance out the comedies, musicals and dramas, MacFarland said. Faculty also consider the types of roles each play will offer the students, she said.

We chose to do a play with only two characters for the first show because it was easier on the costume crew and the technical crew. We would have done "'night, Mother" even if we hadn't chosen to do it for the first show, MacFarland said.

The play offers a good chance for the actors to really work in depth, MacFarland said.

"I really like it, and, in a lot of ways, it's much easier because you know the next line is yours. You can spend so much time learning to relate to that one other person," Foltz said.

The director and actresses are eager to find out the audience's reaction to the play. "I think they'll like our performances, but they will become a little overwhelmed by the entire play," Cullers said.

"You don't go to this show for entertainment; the play is very realistic. This is what theater is about: letting us see how other people feel and think. The Greeks would say it is catharsis; the kind of play where people can get their emotions out at the theater, so they wouldn't even think of committing suicide," Foltz said.

"Part of the reason Jessie is so desperate is because she never got any counseling. There is no need for anyone to reach that level of despair," MacFarland said.

"There have been many plays about mother-daughter relationships; but this one isn't just about a suicide attempt, it's about control," Foltz said.

Film Review

'Extremities' is disturbing, convincing

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

"Extremities" isn't the kind of movie its audience is expected to enjoy; the subject matter — an attempted rape — is too deadly serious for that. Instead, "Extremities" is meant to be disturbing.

Farrah Fawcett plays the intended victim of rape. When she's attacked, she manages to hit the rapist (James Russo) in the face with a blast of bug spray, leaving him nearly blind. But what does she do with him then? Should she call the police?

But there's no evidence of the intended rape. It would be her word against his. In a matter of hours Russo would be back on the streets again, looking for another victim.

So she conks him on the head and imprisons him in the fireplace. But she can't keep him there for long, so she starts digging a grave in the backyard, between the violets and the chrysanthemums.

All of this is so bizarre that is takes on touches of black comedy, especially as Fawcett runs about the house, dressed in only a slip, carrying a shovel, her face smeared with dirt. The subject is so serious, though, most all laughs are uncomfortable ones.

At times it seems the movie is ready to turn into camp, but the movie always manages to stay poised between the serious and the ludicrous. Nor does the film provide us with a character with whom we can really align ourselves. At first, it's easy to root for Fawcett, but once her plans become clear and her eyes become the eyes of a fanatic, it's difficult to cheer her on any longer. The rapist is such a self-pitying liar (prone to extreme histrionics) that we can never care about him.

Maybe once the roommates get home some sanity can be restored, but one of the roommates (Alfre Woodard) is a social worker always on the lookout for the repressed and underprivileged and the other roommate (Diana Scarwid) is a bit of a dolt.

Center aids students with job information

By ANN CLIFFORD
Collegian Reporter

If students are willing to take the time and trouble, they "can create their own opportunities" in the job market, the director of the Career Planning and Placement Center said.

Director Bruce Laughlin said employers like to hire people who take the time to seek information on their own. He said students should take full and early advantage of the job search services available through the center.

The majority of the services provided by the center are directed at graduating seniors. Laughlin said the purpose of the center is to help students assess themselves and "solicit the attention of prospective employers."

Laughlin said students should not be looking for just a job but the appropriate job. The first step in finding the right job is self-evaluation and indentification of what a person wants from a career.

During the process of self-evaluation, students should begin to familiarize themselves with the center, Laughlin said. They should become familiar with the layout of the center, its personnel and the available resources.

The career library and the audio-visual resources at the center, located in Holtz Hall, provide information on topics such as career exploration, best job location, job search strategy, resume writing and interviewing. Students can also receive individual help from career center personnel, Laughlin said.

To be eligible for on-campus interviews and the job search services provided by the center, students must register by filling out the necessary forms. Students graduating in December, May or after summer school should register as soon as possible, Laughlin said.

Students who will be participating in on-campus interviews can register by completing data sheets. The data sheets provide a standardized form to the interviewers so they can spend more time talking to the student and less time studying the background information, he said.

Students interested in jobs that do not have on-campus interviews register with the center by preparing a resume to be kept on file there.

Laughlin said these students are given help and ideas about their job searches and resumes, but an effort is made to "ensure that the student is always in control of what he is presenting to employers."

The center makes an effort to inform all graduating seniors about its services through orientation meetings in the fall. He said approximately 50 percent of the graduating students actively use the services provided by the center and many more use the resource material.

Water exercise lessens pain of arthritis

Participants find therapy enjoyable

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Senior citizens in Manhattan are using water exercises to soothe the pain of arthritis and improve flexibility and muscular strength while enjoying social and physical activity.

"Water soothes the joint, relaxes it, and the body part is lighter in the water which makes it easier to move," said Barbara Janssen, an instructor in the Arthritis Aqua Exercise Program.

The exercises are performed in the water with a slow and steady rhythm. There are approximately 40 students in the Manhattan program.

Students stand in water at shoulder height so the joints will be underwater. None of the exercises require the student to get his or her head under the water. This way, Janssen said swimmers and non-swimmers can feel comfortable in the water.

Clorene Reling, 70, student of the class and retired account clerk for K-State, said she was afraid of water before taking the class. She said she is no longer afraid of the water and thinks the class is great because a person doesn't need to know how to swim.

The water exercises work all of the joints in the body through simple repetitive movements. Students are encouraged to go at their own pace so they don't strain themselves.

"You can use joints without any injury and you feel so much better afterwards," Reling said.

As the joints become stronger and more flexible, the students will use Frisbees and inner tubes as added resistance while performing the exercises.

"I think it's the most wonderful thing that ever happened to Manhattan," Reling said. "I highly recommend it to everyone. I hope people keep interested enough to keep it going."

Enell Foerster and Janssen started teaching the class after Reling encouraged them to get certified to teach it. Both attended classes sponsored by the Arthritis Foundation and the YMCA in Wichita.

Prerequisites for the class were to either have Advanced Life Saving or be a qualified Water Safety Instructor.

"I enjoy teaching very much. It's just in the last few years I started working with senior citizens," said Foerster who has had her Water Safety Instructor cetification for 22 years.

"I knew there was a need for a program specifically for people with arthritis," said Janssen who has had her WSI certificate for eight years.

The program was developed on the West Coast about 10 years ago. Topeka has had a program for six or seven years, but the class is new in Manhattan, Janssen said.

Reling, who is involved with the Arthritis Fund Drive, said she had been trying to get the classes to Manhattan for about six or seven years.

She became familiar with the AAP through the Arthritis Foundation and a television program on arthritis. When Reling heard of the licensing for instructors in Wichita, she encouraged Foerster and Janssen to go.

After their training, Foerster and Janssen started a pilot class at K-State in June 1986. The class was well-received, so they plan on offering the class year round.

Janssen said she forsees training more teachers so they can have more classes.

Each instructor has two students from the adaptive physical education class to assist them with students in the AAP.

The classes are open to people with arthritis and people who need therapy on joints. No permission is required to join the class unless the joints are severely deteriorated or injured. If so, a doctor's permission must be granted for the student to join.

So far, doctors whose patients have wanted to join the class have encouraged them to do so.

Foerster said she hopes that with more publicity, doctors will encourage students to join the class on their own accord.

Europeans step up search for terrorists

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The 12-nation Common Market agreed Thursday to step up its fight against terrorism by intensifying the search for possible terrorist leaders and improving communications among European police forces.

The four-hour emergency meeting of European interior and justice ministers was requested by West Germany and France. Five bomb attacks in Paris earlier this month killed nine people and wounded more than 160.

The ministers said in a communique they decided to "target the major leaders and organizers" of terrorism and to install a new system of "speedy and secure" police communications.

"Terrorists, by their choice of method, are not warriors, but criminals, and must be treated as such," declared Douglas Hurd, the British home secretary who chaired the meeting.

He told a news conference the Common Market "reaffirmed its determination not to make concessions to terrorists."

Robert Pandraud, France's deputy interior minister in charge of security, said he went into the meeting "feeling optimistic concerning the results of our cooperation and my optimism was justified."

He said France would make no concession to terrorism.

"We will not give in to blackmail. Blackmail simply leads to more blackmail," said Pandraud.

Woodard starts screaming, "He's a human being!" while Fawcett snarls, Scarwid trembles, and Russo pleads.

Ultimately the film gives its audience no easy answers. Nor does the film really try to explain why this particular woman would go to such lengths to do away with her attacker. All the movie provides us with is the attempted rape and its consequences, with no background info to help us make sense of it all. But this all seems to be by design. Nevertheless it doesn't make for a particularly satisfying experience, but then again it probably isn't meant to be satisfying.

But the big question is: "Can Farrah Fawcett act?" And the answer is yes. A weak performance might've made the film unintentionally funny, but Fawcett is very convincing. Her role doesn't ask a lot of her, other than to look practically psychotic, but she does that well. Her Kewpie-doll good looks even make her change all the more eerie.

If students are willing to take the time and trouble, they "can create their own opportunities" in the job market, the director of the Career Planning and Placement Center said.

Director Bruce Laughlin said employers like to hire people who take the time to seek information on their own. He said students should take full and early advantage of the job search services available through the center.

The majority of the services provided by the center are directed at graduating seniors. Laughlin said the purpose of the center is to help students assess themselves and "solicit the attention of prospective employers."

Laughlin said students should not be looking for just a job but the appropriate job. The first step in finding the right job is self-evaluation and indentification of what a person wants from a career.

During the process of self-evaluation, students should begin to familiarize themselves with the center, Laughlin said. They should become familiar with the layout of the center, its personnel and the available resources.

The career library and the audio-visual resources at the center, located in Holtz Hall, provide information on topics such as career exploration, best job location, job search strategy, resume writing and interviewing. Students can also receive individual help from career center personnel, Laughlin said.

To be eligible for on-campus interviews and the job search services provided by the center, students must register by filling out the necessary forms. Students graduating in December, May or after summer school should register as soon as possible, Laughlin said.

Students who will be participating in on-campus interviews can register by completing data sheets. The data sheets provide a standardized form to the interviewers so they can spend more time talking to the student and less time studying the background information, he said.

Students interested in jobs that do not have on-campus interviews register with the center by preparing a resume to be kept on file there.

Laughlin said these students are given help and ideas about their job searches and resumes, but an effort is made to "ensure that the student is always in control of what he is presenting to employers."

The center makes an effort to inform all graduating seniors about its services through orientation meetings in the fall. He said approximately 50 percent of the graduating students actively use the services provided by the center and many more use the resource material.

Water exercise lessens pain of arthritis

Participants find therapy enjoyable

By KIM GREENWOOD
Collegian Reporter

Senior citizens in Manhattan are using water exercises to soothe the pain of arthritis and improve flexibility and muscular strength while enjoying social and physical activity.

"Water soothes the joint, relaxes it, and the body part is lighter in the water which makes it easier to move," said Barbara Janssen, an instructor in the Arthritis Aqua Exercise Program.

The exercises are performed in the water with a slow and steady rhythm. There are approximately 40 students in the Manhattan program.

Students stand in water at shoulder height so the joints will be underwater. None of the exercises require the student to get his or her head under the water. This way, Janssen said swimmers and non-swimmers can feel comfortable in the water.

Clorene Reling, 70, student of the class and retired account clerk for K-State, said she was afraid of water before taking the class. She said she is no longer afraid of the water and thinks the class is great because a person doesn't need to know how to swim.

The water exercises work all of the joints in the body through simple repetitive movements. Students are encouraged to go at their own pace so they don't strain themselves.

"You can use joints without any injury and you feel so much better afterwards," Reling said.

As the joints become stronger and more flexible, the students will use Frisbees and inner tubes as added resistance while performing the exercises.

"I think it's the most wonderful thing that ever happened to Manhattan," Reling said. "I highly recommend it to everyone. I hope people keep interested enough to keep it going."

Enell Foerster and Janssen started teaching the class after Reling encouraged them to get certified to teach it. Both attended classes sponsored by the Arthritis Foundation and the YMCA in Wichita.

Prerequisites for the class were to either have Advanced Life Saving or be a qualified Water Safety Instructor.

"I enjoy teaching very much. It's just in the last few years I started working with senior citizens," said Foerster who has had her Water Safety Instructor cetification for 22 years.

"I knew there was a need for a program specifically for people with arthritis," said Janssen who has had her WSI certificate for eight years.

The program was developed on the West Coast about 10 years ago. Topeka has had a program for six or seven years, but the class is new in Manhattan, Janssen said.

Reling, who is involved with the Arthritis Fund Drive, said she had been trying to get the classes to Manhattan for about six or seven years.

She became familiar with the AAP through the Arthritis Foundation and a television program on arthritis. When Reling heard of the licensing for instructors in Wichita, she encouraged Foerster and Janssen to go.

After their training, Foerster and Janssen started a pilot class at K-State in June 1986. The class was well-received, so they plan on offering the class year round.

Janssen said she forsees training more teachers so they can have more classes.

Each instructor has two students from the adaptive physical education class to assist them with students in the AAP.

The classes are open to people with arthritis and people who need therapy on joints. No permission is required to join the class unless the joints are severely deteriorated or injured. If so, a doctor's permission must be granted for the student to join.

So far, doctors whose patients have wanted to join the class have encouraged them to do so.

Foerster said she hopes that with more publicity, doctors will encourage students to join the class on their own accord.

Europeans step up search for terrorists

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The 12-nation Common Market agreed Thursday to step up its fight against terrorism by intensifying the search for possible terrorist leaders and improving communications among European police forces.

The four-hour emergency meeting of European interior and justice ministers was requested by West Germany and France. Five bomb attacks in Paris earlier this month killed nine people and wounded more than 160.

The ministers said in a communique they decided to "target the major leaders and organizers" of terrorism and to install a new system of "speedy and secure" police communications.

"Terrorists, by their choice of method, are not warriors, but criminals, and must be treated as such," declared Douglas Hurd, the British home secretary who chaired the meeting.

He told a news conference the Common Market "reaffirmed its determination not to make concessions to terrorists."

Robert Pandraud, France's deputy interior minister in charge of security, said he went into the meeting "feeling optimistic concerning the results of our cooperation and my optimism was justified."

He said France would make no concession to terrorism.

"We will not give in to blackmail. Blackmail simply leads to more blackmail," said Pandraud.

Konza Prairie open to public Saturday

By The Collegian Staff

Area residents will have the opportunity to tour and view demonstrations at the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area from 9 a.m. until 4 p.m. Saturday.

The 8,616-acre tract of land located southeast of Manhattan on McDowell Creek Road is used by the University for ecological research and education.

The prairie was assembled between 1971-1977 by The Nature Conservancy, a private conservation organization, and leased to K-State.

John Zimmerman, one of the scientists conducting research in the area, said the last time the prairie was opened to the public was in the fall of 1984, when about 1,200 people visited the research area.

Zimmerman said tour hikes, ranging from one-half mile to four miles, will be conducted. On the longer hikes, participants will be able to see fences being erected to contain larger native herbivores, such as bison, antelope and elk that are to be stocked on the preserve in future years.

Demonstrations at the site will include presentations about prairie streams, plants and animals on the prairie and the effects of fire on the prairie community.

A slide show describing the prairie habitats, experimental management plan and on-going ecological studies is scheduled to be shown every half-hour.

Zimmerman said University scientists will be present to answer questions about activities at the prairie.

The Riley County Historical Society will be conducting tours of the historic Dewey Ranch buildings in the headquarters area.

"(The prairie) is recognized as the premier site for prairie research in North America, and is one of only 11 sites funded by the National Science Foundation in their Long-Term Ecological Research Program," Zimmerman said.

Swine scientists assemble on campus

Group studies industry research needs

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Collegian Reporter

Twenty-seven scientists representing universities from seven states were on campus Wednesday and Thursday to discuss research needs for the swine industry.

Scientists from Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois, Indiana and Kansas participated in the working meetings which took place at the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

The scientists are hoping to develop a simulation model that would best fit the swine industry, said Neil Anderson, professor of surgery and medicine. He said a confined environment building would be used as the base.

The scientists could then test the model and find out where problems exist for the swine industry and base research needs on the findings, Anderson said.

"It may sound like we are doing things backward by making the building first and later trying to find the problems, but we feel this method will be very useful," Anderson said.

The simulation model will consist of a swine production unit with test animals of as good a as obtainable and with pigs given correct feed requirements.

With genetics and feeding at a constant and high quality, the scientists can concentrate on diseases that affect swine.

"We (the scientists) think we know a lot about the swine industry," Anderson said, "but pigs are still dying and we need to know why."

The scientists are concerned with problems of the skin, such as flies and lice; diseases of the lungs, such as pneumonia; diseases of the intestine; and reproductive diseases, he said.

Attention from the scientists was directed at the interaction between the actual diseases and factors making the pigs more susceptible to the diseases, Anderson said.

Susceptibility can be associated with stress caused by both the environment and the building housing the pigs, Anderson said.

"The type of building to construct which will provide reasonable protection for the pigs is a major decision for the scientists," Anderson said.

The building must be well-ventilated, have a means of holding down dust and be free from rodents. If these criteria are not met, diseases can occur.

"We are trying to concern ourselves with the negative aspects concerning this problem in the swine industry," Anderson said. By concentrating on the negative aspects, the scientists hope to develop areas that need research attention, he said.

"From the working meetings, the scientists stated their goal as identifying research needs through the simulation model approach and prioritizing the research needs as to where the funding should be spent," Anderson said.

Researchers represented at the meetings included animal scientists, entomologists, veterinarians, agricultural engineers, statisticians and physiologists. The group plans to continue meeting periodically throughout the academic year.

University delegates former official's post

By MAUREEN MURPHY
Collegian Reporter

The University will not hire a replacement for Earl Nolting, former assistant vice president and dean of students, who did not return this fall.

The decision not to replace Nolting was a matter of "internal reallocation," said William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services.

University President Jon Wefald decided Sutton could take over most of Nolting's old jobs, Sutton said. He said the decision not to hire a replacement may not be permanent.

"We'll just have to see how we make out without replacing him," Sutton said.

Nolting accepted a job as the director for adult and continuing education at his alma mater, the University of Minnesota, Sutton said.

"We don't really know why Earl left. Maybe he saw this as an opportunity for him to move on," he said. "You can only move so far if you stay in one place. You have to be mobile if you want to work at a higher level."

Sutton said Nolting had been searching for a professional change since August 1985, and he had been interviewed for a number of jobs.

Nolting's job at K-State covered many aspects of student affairs. Sutton said Nolting's responsibilities have been divided up.

Sutton has replaced Nolting in the position of Student Senate adviser.

Another part of Nolting's job Sutton has taken over is hearing reports on the progress and future plans of the International Student Center and Women's Resource Center.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, also now reports to Sutton, he said.

Another of Nolting's responsibilities, offering University assistance for students and their families in crisis situations, has now been assumed by Caroline Peine, assistant dean of students, Sutton said.

If a student was seriously injured or killed, Nolting was the contact between the student's family and the University. Last year, Nolting handled notification for five student deaths, Sutton said.

In each case, Nolting followed through to make sure the University did whatever it could to help the family, Sutton said.

"Earl was the person that was there to make sure nothing went wrong," Sutton said. "We'll miss him — we already do, but we'll make do."

Suspect Still At Large

By SCOOP NICHOLS
Freelance Reporter

The Fone Crisis Center is looking for a suspect, Karen Concern, on charges of missing the last volunteer training session earlier this month.

Ms. Concern is joined by approximately 30 or 40 cohorts in crime, most of whom are of unknown physical descriptions. These persons have also escaped from Fone duty.

While having been known only for its crisis intervention services in the past, the Fone is gaining a reputation of helping people deal with other problems, that are not so critical—things like the frustration of a broken nail or the anger of getting a speeding ticket, while still helping people through broken relationships, academic frustrations and sexuality concerns among other things.

Karen Concern is a leader of the Fonees—members of the Fone Organization. While little is known about any individual Fonee, it is believed that all are caring individuals wiiling to give 3-8 hours a week to help others in need.

The Fone is asking that socially conscientious citizens who have knowledge of the suspect or her partners contact the Fone office at 532-6565.

All information is kept confidential and K-State and the Manhattan community will be rewarded.

K-State's best runners to battle new course

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

John Capriotti figures it is time to let his horses run.

Capriotti, K-State track and cross country coach, is ready to unveil many of the heralded runners he has held out from K-State's first two meets, Saturday in the inaugural Kansas State Open at Warner Park. The meet, which will feature both men's and women's competitions, is being billed by Capriotti as "the best meet in the Midwest this season."

Several of the top teams in the nation, including Arkansas, will travel to Manhattan to compete. It is the Arkansas men's squad, Capriotti said, that is the creme de la creme of college cross country.

"They are the Oklahoma (in football) of cross country," Capriotti said. "I think actually they might be better in cross country than OU is in football. I don't see anyone beating them this year.

"In fact," Capriotti said, "their freshman team could probably win the Big Eight."

With competition like Arkansas and Colorado and other Big Eight schools, Capriotti pencils the K-State men in about third or fourth. His expectations would be higher, but he is holding out Swedish freshman Jan Jonsson and senior Jim Knudsen. Knudsen is ailing from a sore back, and Jonsson is recovering from a long European summer circuit.

All the others are "on go," however, including top runner Ron Stahl.

"Our goal is for Ron Stahl to be an All-American this year," Capriotti said. "This should be a good test for him. We will see where he stacks up."

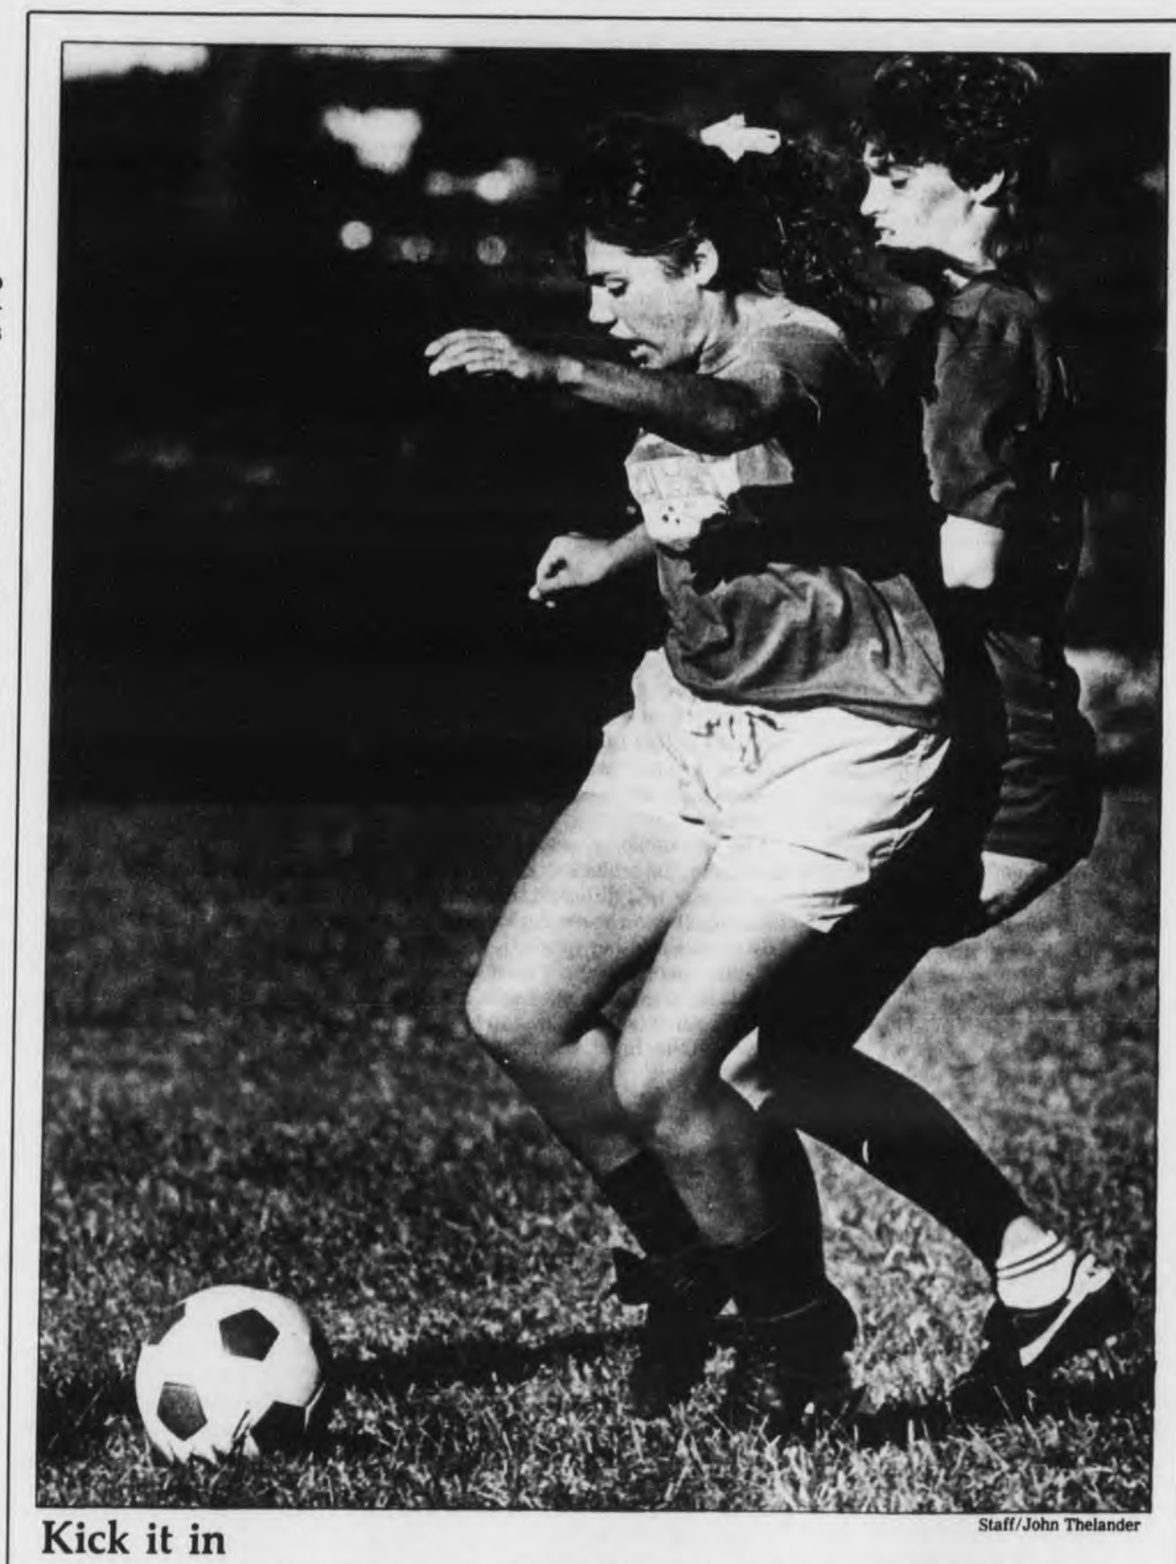
The Wildcat women's team, expected to be a top-10 national finisher again this season, will field a team that reads like a Who's Who of All-Americans. Capriotti plans to open the stable gates and showcase all the thoroughbreds.

Chris Vanatta, Alysun Deckert, Anneli Edling, Angie Barry, Betsy Silzer, Nancy Hoffman and Lisa Wakem will run for the Wildcats. In addition, freshmen Marge Eddy, Becky Ives and Tammy VanLaeys will see action.

Capriotti is going to wait a little longer before he sends injured All-American Jacque Struckhoff back into competition. But, he said he believes she will definitely run this season, which is good news for the team.

"Jacque looks like she will definitely be coming back," he said. "She could run if she had to, but we are going to wait. She has run two 'hard runs' this week. I am not worried about her (being back this year)."

"We still expect to win the women's division," Capriotti said.



The meet will also be the debut for a new course at Warner Park. K-State track officials have been busy laying out the course during the recent semester. The new course gives Wildcat runners, and opposition alike, a more formidable task in accomplishing the required route.

"It is 10 times harder than before," Capriotti said of the new layout. "It is more demanding. We have added some jumps, pits and mud. It will be nice because we haven't had a home meet here in three years. We have a real course now."

The Warner Park course will also be the setting of the Big Eight Championships Nov. 1.

"The more I think about it, this is just a great meet," Capriotti said. "This is probably one of the top two or three meets in the nation this year. Two of the top three teams in the country will be here."

The meet gets under way at 9:30 a.m. with the junior college teams. The women will start at 10:45 and the men round it out at 11:15.

Kick it in

K-State women's soccer team members Shelly Healy and Melissa McCranie scramble for the ball during practice Thursday afternoon. The 'Cats will begin this season at 9:30 a.m. Saturday in Memorial Stadium against University of Kansas. "We can't predict exactly what will happen, but we'll definitely match their (KU's) skill," Coach Doug Schmidt said. The K-State team has had a "strong 30" women at each of the practices.

Neuschafer leads golf team to win

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State men's golf team captured the Baker Invitational Thursday at the Alvamar Country Club in Lawrence with a commanding 12-stroke cushion.

The Wildcat golfers outdistanced runner-up Penn Valley by a combined team score of 312-324 to capture the one-round tournament that played host to 11 Midwest teams.

Individually, the Cat's garnered first and second-place honors in the tournament. Daran Neuschafer took medalist honors with a first place score of 76. Neuschafer outpaced teammate Todd Keller's one round total of 78.

"We did not play real well," Coach Rob Sedorcek said. "The wind was kind of tough all day. We had four (golfers shoot) in the 70s, which is something we didn't do here last time. But I'm still not impressed yet (with the team)."

Todd Martin and Todd Fowler recorded the two remaining 70 scores for the Wildcat team, both coming in at 79.

Freshman Jeff Sedorcek, who grabbed eighth-place honors in the Kansas Invitational on the same course last week, suffered his worst round thus far as a collegiate with an 81.

Following K-State and Penn Valley, respectively, were Washburn, Pittsburg State, Fort Hays State, Baker, William Jewell, UMKC, Longview and Benedictine.

The men's team is not in action again until Oct. 10-11 when they play in the Emporia State Invitational.

Wildcats earn week's rest before facing OU

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

K-State football coach Stan Parrish figures worrying about what's going to happen when the 'Cats take the field next Saturday against powerful Oklahoma isn't worth the effort.

So, he devoted this week, since K-State doesn't play Saturday, to some light preparations for the Oklahoma game and has allowed some much-needed extra recovery time for injured players on the roster.

As for the Sooners, Parrish's opinion of top-ranked Oklahoma matches that of most of the nation's other coaches. He's very, very impressed.

"I watched them dismantle Minnesota (last Saturday) and Minnesota doesn't have a bad football team. They're a team that went to a bowl game (the Independence) last year, and they have almost everybody back," Parrish said. "I don't worry about Oklahoma. I think you know you're playing a great football team, maybe one of the best of all time. You've got to worry about yourself and doing things well... . They don't have a weakness."

Oklahoma is set to meet the No. 2 Miami Hurricanes Saturday at the Orange Bowl to decide the top ranking in The Associated Press poll (see related story).

The typically upbeat Parrish liked what he saw in K-State's workouts this week on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday.

"The three practices we had were as good as any we had all year long," he said.

Last Saturday, K-State made a strong comeback attempt, but fell short in a 35-22 loss to Texas Christian at Fort Worth. A couple of crucial turnovers and a controversial call on a pass reception by John Williams at the Horned Frog 1-yard line kept the 'Cats from making the margin closer or even turning things around.

"I think we played our best football of the year the last half of the last (TCU) game," Parrish said.

The injury situation for K-State has cleared up somewhat. The bad news for the 'Cats is that defensive back Brad Lambert and wide receiver Todd Cowings (both knee injuries) will join quarterback John Welch (wrist) on the sidelines for the remainder of the season.

On the positive side, linebacker David Wallace, who hurt his knee in the Western Illinois game, and center Rob Goode, who was out with a back ailment, will both be available for the Oklahoma game.

Whether having Wallace and Goode healthy again will do any good against Oklahoma, though, is an open question. Parrish, for his part, is just trying to enter the game with a positive attitude.

"We'll be a 10-touchdown underdog. The game won't even be on the board. There will be no line on it," he said. "We've just got to keep up the hard work and feel good about ourselves."

OU, Miami game matches college's best

By TOM MORRIS
Assistant Sports Editor

Only 19 matchups have ever occurred between the nation's top two college football teams since The Associated Press poll began in 1936, but No. 20 will take place Saturday when No. 1 Oklahoma faces second-ranked Miami.

The matchup has attracted nationwide attention, including the attention of K-State Coach Stan Parrish. The Wildcats have this week off, but face Oklahoma Oct. 4 in Norman.

"You always enjoy having a week off and getting to see who we're going to play next week, and obviously we throw the ball some and so does Miami, so we'll have a keen interest in that," Parrish said.

The first AP 1-2 match up was in 1943 when top-ranked Notre Dame edged Iowa Pre-Flight 14-13 (rankings included military teams during World War II).

In other 1-2 games, the No. 1 team has won 13 times, second-ranked squads have won three times and there have been two ties. OU has been involved in three games involving the top two teams, and the Sooners are a surprising 0-3 in those contests.

Oklahoma coach Barry Switzer and Miami coach Jimmy Johnson are no strangers; Johnson used to coach at interstate rival Oklahoma State. Switzer is 5-1 vs. Johnson (at both Oklahoma State and Miami), but Johnson's Hurricanes defeated Oklahoma 27-14 in Norman last year. It was the Sooners' only loss of the season.

"This is why we play the game, to see who's best," Switzer said. "I hope we play better than a year ago. I don't consider this a revenge game at all. I think both teams are as good as there is in the country today."

"They (Miami) do not have any weaknesses as far as I'm concerned. It will take a perfect game plus some mistakes on their part for us to win," he added.

Oklahoma is favored by 4½ points, and Parrish said the only way the Sooners will lose is if they beat themselves.

"I think OU has a team that, unless they make mistakes, is perfect because they can control the clock and control the game," Parrish said.

The Sooners, Parrish said, will also have to battle the Hurricanes' 12th man — the crowd.

"It's an away game for Oklahoma," he said, "so obviously they're going to have to overcome the crowd, but they're good at that."

Parrish said for Miami to win, the Hurricanes must slow Oklahoma's powerful wishbone offense.

"I think they have to force some negative plays," he said.

K-State's coach said he is as anxious as any football fan for the Sooner-Hurricane match up which is scheduled for a 2:30 p.m. CDT kickoff at the Orange Bowl in Miami.

"It's got all the earmarks of a great game, and I would not be surprised if there wouldn't be a rematch of this very same game in the Orange Bowl on New Year's night," Parrish said.

"It's a great match up," Johnson said. "With Oklahoma being the defending national champion and with their only loss a year ago being to the University of Miami, with Heisman Trophy candidates on both sides — our quarterback, Vinny Testaverde, and their linebacker, Brian Bosworth...I think it may be one of the best games in a long time."

Briefly In Sports

Saberhagen wins first since July 27

MINNEAPOLIS — Willie Wilson and Jim Sundberg hit home runs to highlight a 17-hit attack and Bret Saberhagen won his first game in almost two months Thursday, leading the Kansas City Royals to a 8-1 victory over the Minnesota Twins.

Saberhagen, 7-11, who won the 1985 American League Cy Young Award with a 20-6 record, had not won since July 27. He was on the disabled list from Aug. 10 to Sept. 1 with a sore right shoulder.

Crew teams to row in Des Moines

K-State's men's and women's crew teams will be heading to Des Moines, Iowa, this weekend to compete in The Head of the Des Moines River, a three mile regatta on the Des Moines River.

The men's team is defending champions of the race and Coach Don Rose expects his team to do well once again. With most crew members returning, they will have a full varsity boat, Rose pointed out.

"The women's team is short on returnees," but they are hoping for a good show, said women's coach Brett York.

The teams competing this weekend are Des Moines crew team, Creighton, K-State and Notre Dame.

York will also take the men's and women's novice teams to an fnformal regatta Saturday in Topeka called the Scratch 8's Race. Teams from Kansas, Washburn and Wichita State will compete on Shawnee Lake.

Inexperience key in 'Cats' Big 8 opener

Iowa State's attack also led by youth

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State's volleyball squad opens the Big Eight season today with a match against the Cyclones of Iowa State in Ames. The Wildcats enter their conference schedule at 5-5.

And just as important, the 'Cat spikers will be gunning for their first road victory of the season. K-State is 0-3 in away games after losing three straight matches at the Quality Inn Classic in Las Cruces, N.M., during the weekend.

Key injuries to a couple of veteran players have forced Coach Scott Nelson to juggle his lineup and to take a different coaching angle.

"It's a different approach than I anticipated at the beginning of the year. Basically, what I anticipated was having a fairly experienced team and having new setters, and putting new players in less pressure situations so they can develop at a little slower rate," Nelson said.

"Basically, what I've had to do is put people out there that haven't had a lot of college experience and get them to play at a fairly high level.

"Overall, I think we may have been able to pull out a match or two if we'd had more experience on the court," Nelson said, "(but) I think we're going to be a much stronger team later on because the younger players have had to step in and compete."

Nelson said what his team lacks in experience, has been compensated for with hustle and hard work.

"When you have an older, more veteran team, they develop the ability to — if they're not playing great — play solid, and not beat themselves," Nelson said.

"When you're a young team you just don't have that ability. The effort is real important. You have to go out and work as hard as you can," he added.

Nelson said it is important that his team plays well against a 4-5 Iowa State squad.

"They're very much like we are," he said. "(They) have young players. Your success kind of goes with your age. When you're playing well you have success, when you're struggling you tend not to have as much.

"Iowa State is a big rivalry for us. There's not a great deal of love lost between the teams," Nelson said. "It's going to be a real competitive match with Iowa State."

K-State stays in Iowa Saturday to face a 2-8 Drake squad which the Wildcats defeated earlier this season in four games.

"Last year, Drake went without a win. I thought coming in (earlier this year) we took them real lightly. All of a sudden we discovered they were playing some volleyball, and it kind of had reverse pressure on us," Nelson said.

"I think when we play them at there place, we'll take them a little more seriously and go after them, because we realize we're at their place and they have the potential to win games. I think we'll be better prepared mentally to play them and play them tough," he said.

Despite early season injuries and a mediocre start, Nelson sees plenty of cause for optimism with his squad's recent play.

"I feel comfortable with the team. I see us in our team systems improving. I'm starting to see some leadership from different individuals coming forth under pressure or in times when we kind of need someone to take charge to get us moving. I'm starting to see some things I haven't seen the previous couple of weeks of competition," Nelson said.

"We gave ourselves a good boost of confidence (Wednesday against Oral Roberts). We're going to need a tremendous effort for us to be successful since we don't have a lot of veteran players right now in the lineup. I think effort is real important," he said.

"It would be good to pick up one or two wins this weekend on the road, but probably more importantly it would be better to play well under those conditions whether we win or not."

Alumnus donates artifact collection

By JIM BLAKE
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Anthropology, Sociology and Social Work has received a former student's collection of arrowheads and other artifacts, some dating back to 2000 B.C.

William Laverentz and his wife, Ellenora, donated the Indian artifacts that Laverentz has collected during the past 60 years since he left K-State to farm at Bendena.

The collection includes pieces from the Archaic Period of northeast Kansas — 2000 B.C. to the first century A.D. — and from the Woodland Period of the Oklahoma Complex in Spiro, Okla., — A.D. 100 to 1300, said Patricia O'Brien, professor of anthropology.

The collection, currently being displayed on the first floor of East Waters Hall, will eventually be dismantled and used for teaching purposes in the department, O'Brien said. She said she hopes to later reassemble it with other artifacts for a larger display.

"Two things make (artifacts) valuable," she said. "One is context, or where it is found, and the other is its use in teaching."

The collection contains stone fishhooks, animal effigies resembling birds, a clay pipe made around the year 1000 and spearheads. She said the artifacts from Kansas are made from a light tannish-gray flint, while the Oklahoma pieces are dark blue-gray.

"Arrowheads are classified by shape. Each one has subtle variations — some are good, some are bad or made from different materials," O'Brien said.

The exact location of each of Laverentz's finds is not documented, although O'Brien said she suspects most of the Kansas artifacts were found on his family farm.

"The similarities indicate they came from one or two sites," O'Brien said. "Most of the pieces came from Oklahoma."

O'Brien said in the early years of study, archaeologists and anthropologists thought that fishhooks were made of stone like those in the Laverentz collection. It was later found that chiefly bone was used for this purpose.

"In some cases these (artifacts) are forgeries made to fool the early collectors into buying them," O'Brien said.

Another item in the Laverentz collection is an arrowhead of obsidian, or volcanic glass, uncommon to this region. O'Brien said it must have come from a region of higher volcanic activity such as Yellowstone Park.

The family donated the collection after deciding to sell their farm in Bendena because of current conditions in the economy.

"The arrowhead collection may have stemmed from his interest in antiques," O'Brien said. "They seemed to have a collection of anything you could think of — including a collection of antique egg beaters."

The Laverentzes have three sons and a daughter, all of whom attended K-State, the youngest graduating in 1967.

Soviets honor heroes for Chernobyl actions

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Soviet Union on Thursday bestowed its highest honors for heroism on three firefighters at the Chernobyl nuclear plant who battled flames at the No. 4 reactor and prevented a greater nuclear disaster.

Two of the firefighters, Viktor Kibenok and Vladimir Pravik, died of radiation sickness. The government newspaper Izvestia printed a picture of the surviving firefighter, Maj. Leonid Telyatnikov, on the front page beside official decrees naming them Heroes of the Soviet Union.

Telyatnikov, who was pictured in Soviet media in May with a full head of hair, was bald in the Izvestia photograph.

Doctors treating victims of the April 26 Chernobyl disaster, which has claimed 31 lives to date by official count, have said hair loss is a common consequence of exposure to massive radiation doses.

Radiation from Chernobyl spread across several European countries and large areas of the Soviet Union. The losses to the Soviet economy from the disaster have been estimated by the Soviets at the equivalent of nearly $3 billion.

The announcement that three men had been honored as heroes was made a day after the newspaper Literary Gazette carried a major article that criticized bureaucratic bungling, selection of the site and other shortcomings as contributing to the disaster at Chernobyl.

The decrees honoring Telyatnikov, Pravik and Kibenok said they had been awarded the gold stars given to heroes in the Soviet Union for "courage, heroism and selflessness."

Soviet television also announced the awards, showing photographs of the three firefighters in their uniforms before the Chernobyl disaster.

Telyatnikov was also shown in what the television said was a May interview in a Moscow hospital. He was much thinner than in the earlier photograph and his hair was almost gone.

The television commentator apologized that TV could not show pictures of the reactor fire on April 26 and said film shot then was spoiled by radiation.

For the first time, television showed a diagram of the plant which made clear that its four reactors are at each corner of a rectangular machine hall containing the turbine generators powered by steam from the reactors.

The roof of the building housing the No. 4 reactor was ablaze when Kibenok and Pravik arrived at the scene, the television commentator reported.

"The most terrible thing was that the fire was threatening the machine hall...with all the turbines" and could have spread to the No. 3 reactor, the television said.

Like other media accounts, it said Telyatnikov, Kibenok and Pravik prevented the blaze from engulfing the No. 3 reactor and nearby oil storage tanks.

The youth newspaper Komsomolskaya Pravda on May 16 gave a vivid account of how Pravik and Kibenok arrived to fight the blaze minutes after No. 4 reactor had been ripped open by an explosion.

Telyatnikov, who had been on vacation, came 20 minutes later, the television said.

Six of the firefighters at Chernobyl that night have since died and are buried with 20 other victims of the disaster at a special site in a graveyard just outside Moscow.

Kibenok, Pravik and Telyatnikov doused flames that threatened the No. 3 reactor, Izvestia said Thursday in a story headlined, "Thank You, Heroes of Chernobyl."

The article lamented the death of Pravik and Kibenok, whose wife told him two days before the Chernobyl disaster that she was expecting their first child.

Telyatnikov was hospitalized for a long time, Izvestia said, "but doctors managed to save his life."

Leadership workshop set for Saturday

By MARY LYNN GATSCHET
Collegian Reporter

As K-State's new leader, President Jon Wefald will deliver the opening remarks at this year's "Take the Steps to Leadership" workshop Saturday morning in the Union Little Theatre.

Wefald's address will be followed by a series of informative sessions on leadership skills, campus resources and policies, said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and organizer of the workshop.

She said the sessions are targeted toward students in leadership positions, new students and those seeking to better their skills in time and stress management, motivation and effective use of the campus.

Routson said those who usually attend are active in student organizations or are new students interested in becoming involved in campus activities.

The workshop is set up in four, 45-minute time blocks. Each block has three or four different sessions so the student can choose the topic that best suits his or her needs.

"But a person doesn't need to feel obligated to attend every session. If he rolls out of bed late, he can attend some of the later ones," Routson said. "People can come to any session or just come for a couple of sessions. People who go love the workshop. It's just a matter of getting the people there."

The sessions are led by faculty and staff members with expertise in particular fields. They will be presenting programs and answering students' questions. Some of the specific topics include "Delegation of Authority" by Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement; "Communication" by Emily Weinacker, director of Goodnow Hall; and "Handling Conflicts: Different Points of View" by Fred Newton, director of the Counseling Center.

Student Body President Steve Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, who has attended the workshop, will also co-lead a discussion with Routson and Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, senior in marketing. The session, called "K-State and the New Student," will present different ways to enhance a college education through involvement in living groups, student organizations and campus activities.

"I feel it's an educational opportunity for everyone to learn about the University — anyone who would like to get involved and would like to know about all oppurtunities available on campus," Johnson said.

President Wefald's welcome will begin at 8:30 a.m.

There is no registration fee, and the workshop is sponsored by the University Activities Board, Student Governing Association and Blue Key.

Gallup reports high marks on media coverage

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Many Americans have serious reservations about how the news media report terrorist incidents, but people also think news organizations do a good job of covering major events like airplane hijackings, said a survey released Thursday.

These mixed feelings toward the news media were brought out in a Gallup Organization poll commissioned by the Times Mirror, a Los Angeles-based media organization.

"Americans are of two minds about press-related issues," Gallup President Andrew Kohut said. "They give the news medi high marks on overall performance, but sharply lower grades on specific press practices."

On specific stories, 84 percent of the respondents who followed the news said the media did a good or excellent job covering the January explosion of the space shuttle Challenger; 80 percent felt that way about the TWA flight 847 hostage crisis in Beirut; 80 percent approved of coverage of the Achille Lauro hijacking in the Mediterrean; 79 percent thought the Chernobyl nuclear disaster was handled well, and 71 percent approved the reporting of the Pan American World Airways hijacking in Pakistan earlier this month.

Still, many Americans seem disturbed by the role the media plays in terrorist incidents, the poll said.

For instance, 51 percent of Americans said the news media give terrorist incidents too much attention, while 40 percent said the coverage is about right. But 56 percent said the news media give terrorists too much opportunity to promote their cause.

The findings were based on telephone interviews with 1,504 people in July. Gallup said there is an error rate of 3 percent.

LaCrosse bank closes, marks 12th failure in state this year

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Home State Bank of LaCrosse closed Thursday after it was declared insolvent by state banking authorities, becoming the state's 12th bank failure of the year.

A spokeswoman for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. said the bank would reopen Friday as a branch of the Farmers Bank and Trust n.a., of Albert, a town about 20 miles east of LaCrosse in west-central Kansas.

The failure marked the second bank insolvency in LaCrosse and the third in Rush County in about the last 10 months. Until Nov. 21, 1985, when the town's other bank failed, the community's 1,600 residents had two independent banking institutions from which to choose.

However, the era of hometown banking came to an end in LaCrosse at about 11 a.m. Thursday when The Home State Bank closed after it was declared insolvent by State Banking Commissioner Eugene T. Barrett Jr.

The sale to Farmers Bank and Trust was made possible under a limited branch banking bill the Kansas Legislature passed this year. The new law allows failed banks in one-bank towns with populations of 3,500 or less to reopen as a branch of a healthier institution if the insolvent bank otherwise would close permanently.

But an official with the Kansas Bankers Association, Jim Maag, revealed Wednesday that in at least one bank insolvency earlier this year, the FDIC has passed up a bid to operate a failed bank as an independent institution in favor of a higher branch bank bid.

Attorney General Robert T. Stephan issued an opinion Wednesday saying the limited branch bank law was intended to be used only in a worst case scenario and the FDIC is forced to accept a bid to operate a failed bank independently before reviewing branch bank bids.

Glion Curtis, an FDIC attorney who oversaw bidding for the LaCrosse bank, said there was no option to sell The Home State Bank as a free-standing institution.

"There were no bids (to operate the bank independently) that were acceptable to the corporation," Curtis said.

Neil Woerman, a spokesman for Stephan, said the attorney general was monitoring the use of the limited branch banking law and that Stephan expects the FDIC's decisions to sell failed banks may become the subject of a private lawsuit at some point in the future.

"It's an issue that seems bound to go to court," said Woerman, who added that he had no information about the bidding for the LaCrosse bank.

Julie Amberson, an FDIC spokeswoman, said depositors of the failed bank automatically would become depositors of the assuming bank subject to court approval.

Amberson said The Home State Bank had assets totaling $13.7 million. She said Farmers Bank and Trust would assume about $12.4 million in 3,400 deposit accounts and has agreed to pay the FDIC a purchase premium of $312,000.

Farmers Bank and Trust also would purchase certain loans and other assets of the failed bank for $5.9 million, Amberson said.

"To facilitate the transaction, the FDIC will advance $6.5 million to the assuming bank and will retain assets of the failed bank with a book value of about $7.8 million," Amberson said.

Stanley Gish, an FDIC closing manager at the bank, said that of the deposits, about $31,000 in three accounts was above the FDIC's $100,000 insurance limit.

Gish said the bank had loans totaling $10.7 million, about 47 percent of which were agricultural related. The bank also held foreclosed property with a book value of slightly more than $1 million and about $5 million of the loans were classified as troubled loans, he said.

"Excessive loan losses over a period of time depleted their capital," Gish said of reasons for the bank's closing. "The agricultural economy certainly was a factor, but lending practices also played a major role."

The Farmers and Merchants State Bank of LaCrosse, which failed Nov. 21, 1985, was the last of 13 banks to be declared insolvent last year. After the closing of the Farmers and Merchants State Bank, The Home State Bank became the only banking institution in town.

The Citizens State Bank of McCracken, also in Rush County, failed June 5.

Gish said the LaCrosse bank did not sustain a run on deposits Thursday morning.

GOP state chairman levels charges

Official attacks Carlin's use of armory

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Republican State Chairman Vern Chesbro charged Thursday that Democrats used the local National Guard Armory for a political function in early August with the public having to pay for it.

However, Maj. Gen. Ralph Tice, the state adjutant, refuted Chesbro's contention, saying the National Guard provided security for the function for free, because it involved Gov. John Carlin, and that the governor's office was billed $186 for use of the armory.

A former chief aide to Carlin who is now on the campaign staff of Lt. Gov. Tom Docking also denied Chesbro's accusation and said Republicans are "grasping at straws" because Docking is gaining so rapidly on GOP governor nominee Mike Hayden.

Chesbro told a Statehouse news conference the Docking campaign and the Democratic Party have on several occasions "attempted to benefit from illegal...participation of certain state employees and the apparent efforts toward intimidation of other employees to gain their participation."

The other incidents, Chesbro said, were Docking's use of the Capitol rotunda to announce his candidacy last February, use of City Hall in Kansas City, Kan. for a similar announcement, and fundraisers staged for him by officials in the Kansas Corporation Commission and Department of Human Resources.

The latest incident, the GOP chairman told reporters, was Aug. 9 when the annual birthday party for Carlin, a Democrat serving the final months of his second four-year term, was held in the National Guard Armory here. It was moved there because of rain.

Chesbro charged the Democrats paid nothing for use of the armory and in addition did not pay the salaries of six national guardsmen who he said were "ordered to active duty and paid by state funds to provide 'support' for this Democrat function."

"This support appears to be assisting with the parking of cars," Chesbro said. "I believe the founding fathers of our state and nation did not have in mind that the guard be relegated to duties such as directing traffic at political functions."

Chesbro produced copies of a state voucher showing the six guardsmen were paid a total of $93.81 in subsistence for "support of governor's birthday."

He called it "a violation of the adjutant general's own rules and regulations — which have the force of law — requiring payment for use of the army for a public function."

Tice, a registered Republican, dismissed Chesbro's allegations as uninformed.

"I provide security for the governor when he has functions," Tice said. "We've done it for every governor for 40 years. We did the same thing for Gov. Bennett when he was at Cedar Crest."

Tice said the armory already was open on Aug. 9 because a National Guard unit was training that weekend. He said there were six military policemen on duty for training, and they were used to provide the security for the governor's function. Since they always are used for the governor's security, the state paid their subsistence because it would have paid it anyway, he said.

Tice also said Jim Ploger, a Carlin aide who asked for use of the armory, was billed the $186 for renting the armory.

He said many times the state does not bill groups for purely public functions, but in this case the governor's office was billed.

Mike Swenson, who was Carlin's press secretary and chief spokesman until he resigned Sept. 2 to become communications director for Docking's campaign, said Chesbro is wrong on several accounts.

Swenson said Carlin's birthday party has never been a fund-raiser "for the governor or anybody else." He said the $10 ticket covers only food and entertainment.

Swenson also said the function is not restricted to Democrats. Anyone who buys a ticket can attend, he said. Swenson said U.S. District Court Judge Richard D. Rogers, a Republican, attended the party at the armory.

"It's becoming more and more apparent the Republican Party knows its candidate for governor is in serious trouble," said Swenson. "Out of desperation, it is following the lead of its candidate in attacking the character of their opponent."

Mosque

munity.

The prayer hall is located in the basement of the mosque, where practicing Moslems pray five times a day.

The first floor of the mosque has a television room, two halls for studying, a place to serve meals and have gatherings, and a small library containing literature on the Islamic faith, Aly said. The first floor also has a grocery store where Middle Eastern food items can be purchased.

The second floor includes the living quarters for four K-State students who are Moslems.

The mosque is maintained and cared for by all the members of the association, Aly said. The association comprises about 30 active members, though there are more than 100 Moslems in the Manhattan area, he said.

The primary purpose of the association is to educate Moslems and non-Moslems about the Islamic faith, Aly said. The association is also dedicated to promoting good relations among Moslems and non-Moslems by sponsoring cultural events and social activities, he said.

There is an unwritten goal of the association as well. The members, bound closely by the Islamic faith, try to be available to each other in times of need, Aly said. If a fellow Moslem is sick, members visit him or her and offer assistance.

When newcomers to Manhattan's Islamic community arrive, the association tries to help them settle in and feel welcome, he said. If a fellow Moslem needs money, the association will loan it to him or her, said Gamal Ahmed, vice president of the association and graduate student in engineering.

Though the closeness of the association's members is based primarily on their common religious experience, the strength of the group comes from the religion itself, Aly said.

Islam has about 1 billion followers worldwide. In Arabic, "Islam" literally means "humbleness to God." The religion is based on the teachings of the Koran, the sacred book of Islam. Moslems believe the Koran was dictated to the prophet Mohammed by the archangel Gabriel.

"Moslems believe in the same God as Christians and Jews," Aly said. "The difference is in the name we use for God. In Arabic it is Allah."

Aly said Islam dictates reverence of the Bible and the Torah.

Everyone, including non-Moslems, is welcome to visit the mosque, he said.

"Moslems and non-Moslems — we are all a single brotherhood, all created by God," Aly said. "The mosque is not ours to close to anyone. It is God's."

U.S. considers drug eradication efforts

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Edwin Meese said Thursday the United States is discussing with other countries the possibility of conducting joint drug eradication ventures similar to the operation now under way in Bolivia.

Meese, meeting with reporters to discuss administration efforts to stop drug trafficking internationally and within U.S. borders, was asked whether the much-publicized Operation Blast Furnace operation, targeting clandestine cocaine laboratories in the jungles of Bolivia, was a one-of-a-kind campaign that would not be repeated.

"I would hope that we would have similar types of operations tailored to the situation and the needs of other countries," said Meese, adding, "We are looking at plans in a number of countries." He said discussions were ongoing and declined to identify the countries.

The Bolivian operation has destroyed 15 cocaine processing facilities and uncovered 23 large storage areas. As a result, the market for coca leaves has been significantly depressed, taking the profit out of coca production, Justice Department officials have said.

In other developments Thursday:

—President Reagan said he and his wife, Nancy, will meet Oct. 6-7 here with a group of American ambassadors to other nations, to "discuss how we can mobilize an international commitment to win the war against illegal drug use."

Reagan said the meeting would be attended by "our ambassadors from those countries which face major drug production, consumption, and transportation problems." He discussed it in more detail in a speech to the National Fraternal Congress, an organization of groups engaged in volunteer work.

—The Justice Department defended Reagan's drug-testing plan for federal employees at a congressional hearing where the president was accused of "trashing the Constitution through trendy gimmicks."

Assistant Attorney General Richard K. Willard said Reagan's sweeping executive order, issued last week, contains adequate safeguards to protect federal workers against violations of their Fourth Amendment guarantees against unreasonable government searches and seizures.

The National Treasury Employees Union has filed a lawsuit seeking to block implementation of the plan, which would affect more than a million federal workers in "sensitive" jobs, such as public safety employees and people with top-rated security clearances.

—An official of the U.S. Forest Service said that Viet Cong-style traps such as camouflaged pits studded with sharpened stakes are being used by narcotics growers on trails leading to marijuana plantations in some states.

Dale Robertson, deputy chief of the Forest Service, said in an interview that fish hooks dangling from trees at eye level as well as pipe bombs detonated by trip wires are being used by armed growers who, at times, launch sniper attacks on federal agents to keep them off the plantations.

Enrollment

tive institutions of higher learning. Our enrollment figures certainly attest to that," Budig said in an article in the Thursday issue of The Kansas City Times.

The article also said Budig cautioned that KU's growth was straining the university's teaching resources and funds had to be diverted from other essential activities.

The Wichita State University reported a decrease in enrollment for the fall semester. This year's enrollment figure of 16,843 is down from 16,902 for fall 1985.

However, WSU freshman enrollment is up 4.7 percent, and graduate student enrollment increased 2.2 percent, said Dave Meabon, associate vice president for academic affairs at WSU.

middle-income families. They are the men and women to whom we must make our case, no matter which way we vote."

"The loss of tax provisions favoring capital income may lead to a decline in investment as farmers and small businessmen choose to repair, rather than to replace equipment and build new plants," said Rep. Edward Madigan, R-Ill., echoing economists who testified before a congressional panel.

Sponsors said the lower corporate rates and generous depreciation system in the bill would be sufficient incentive for business to invest. Anti-tax shelter features would free for productive use money that now is invested to avoid tax rather than turn a profit, backers say.

Opponents had other problems with the bill. Some were concerned that while helping the poor and the rich, it would discriminate against middle-income families by restricting some prize deductions.

Others were upset that home-state industries would lose specific tax breaks.

The most-striking feature is a significant reduction in tax rates. The top individual rate, now 50 percent, would be cut to 33 percent, although about three-quarters of Americans would pay a flat 15 percent rate. The 46-percent maximum corporate rate would be cut to 34 percent.

Coliseum

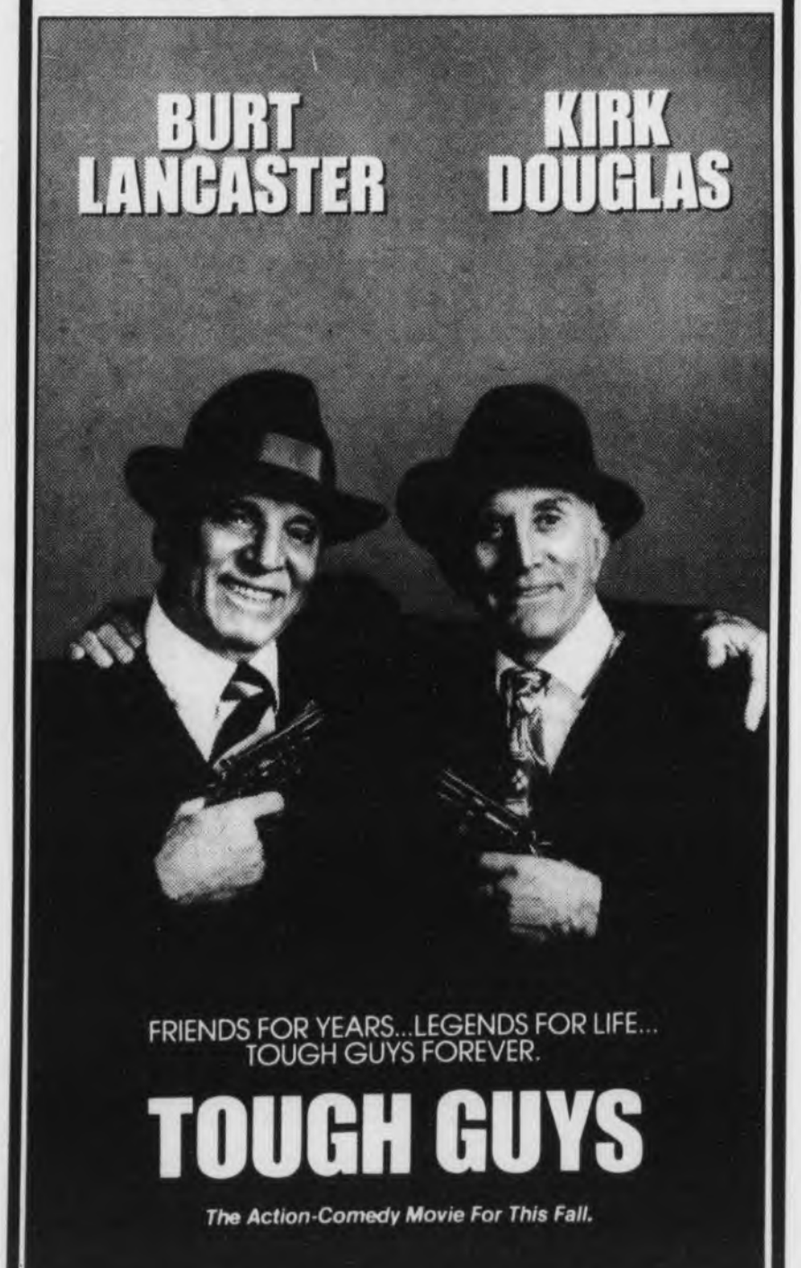
ball game.

An attempt is being made to bring back the original banner that supported the coliseum for the ceremony, said Steve Miller, assistant athletic director. The banner was made in the late 1970s.



Four of the original leaders in the student push for the coliseum will be recognized at the ceremony. They are K-State radio announcer Mitch Holthus, former athletic department representative Brian Rassette, Kansas Secretary of Agriculture Sam Brownback and Bill Manning.

The groundbreaking will be done by the speakers with purple and white shovels and then anyone is welcome to dig their shovel into the ground, Hein said. The ceremony is open to anyone who wishes to attend.

Legislators consider drug bill to counteract prior proposal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate is nearing passage of a $1.4 billion measure to combat drug abuse after backing off the stiffest features of a counterpart bill passed by the House — ordering the military to seal U.S. borders against smugglers and establishing the death penalty in major drug cases.

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said Sunday that the House's demand that the military intercept all drug shipments from abroad was absurd.

Interviewed on CBS' "Face the Nation," Weinberger said the military is already "doing a very great deal," to fight drugs, including sharing intelligence data with law enforcement agencies and providing logistical help to other nations for drug raids, as was the case recently in Bolivia.

But he noted that 76,000 airplanes cross the U.S. borders every day, and "we haven't yet discovered the means to know what's inside each one of them." To meet the mandate of the House bill, "we'd have to start shooting planes down." He added: "I don't think you want your military out acting like local police. I don't."

The Senate plowed through a series of amendments to its bill by early Sunday before ending a marathon day that also saw the Republican-controlled chamber pass a landmark tax-overhaul bill. It will return to the bill Tuesday afternoon.

Senate passage would send the bill to a House-Senate conference committee to reconcile the differences between the two versions. That panel will try to work quickly so both chambers can pass the same bill and send it to President Reagan before adjournment.

Many senators declared their constituents are deeply worried about the drug issue and are demanding strong action, with the election barely a month away. But the death-penalty provision was withdrawn even after a majority of the Senate

Regents may debate tuition hike

By BARRY STEFFEN
Collegian Reporter

A 5-percent to 8-percent increase in tuition is being considered by the Kansas Board of Regents, according to a University Associated Students of Kansas representative.

Patty Hipsher, ASK representative and senior in political science, said students currently pay 25 percent of the funds necessary to operate the University. The proposed increase would mean each student would be paying $50 to $100 more in tuition each semester.

An ASK fall news release reported the increase was being considered because of a lack of state funds to finance institutions.

The state fund is made up of tax collections from personal and corporate incomes, sales and excises. The release said Kansas incomes have not increased enough to cover the appropriations needed by the Regents to adequately fund institutions.

"I certainly don't forsee action being taken on the issue this year," Hipsher said. "I think it primarily depends on the economic situation of the state."

Hipsher said advisers informed her that no proposal had been made at the present time and no university presidents were in favor of an increase.

President Jon Wefald said he could not recall the possibility of an increase being mentioned at the Regents' September meeting, but said he was not present the entire time.

Hipsher said a similar instance with tuition increase arose while Wefald was chancellor for the seven-school university system in Minnesota.

Tom Rawson, director of planning and budget for the Regents, said the economic situation of Kansas will hold a bearing on the decision. However, he said he believed the idea was only being "thrown around" at the present time and not under serious consideration.

Air Force cadets repaint city's centennial statue

By The Collegian Staff

The 30-foot statue of the legendary Johnny Kaw received a face lift with the help of paint, brushes and a tall ladder Saturday in Manhattan's City Park.

The ROTC Air Force Cadets sponsored by the Air Force/ROTC Arnold Air Society painted the statue for one of the unit's community service projects.

Lt. Col. Terry Heyns, head of the Department of Aerospace Studies, said the city furnished the equipment and materials, and the cadets provided the labor.

About 20 cadets took turns scraping and painting the statue and finished in four hours.

The community service project gives everyone a chance to work toward a better community, said Mike Figurski, an ROTC cadet and junior in electrical engineering.

"The statue needed painting...it helps improve the history of Manhattan," Figurski said.

The cadets also plan to do a variety of other fund-raising projects.

Mike Culver, junior in mechanical engineering, said the project was an opportunity that doesn't come up often.

"The statue is a visible sign of Manhattan," Culver said.

The legend of Johnny Kaw was written in 1954 by G.A. Filinger, a former University horticulturist.

The statue was designed by E.J. Tomasch, a former professor at K-State. It was erected in 1966 as a part of Manhattan's centennial celebration. Businessmen from the area contributed the materials to build the statue.

The legend of Johnny Kaw was written in 1954 by G.A. Filinger, a former University horticulturist. Johnny Kaw represents a Kansas pioneer wheat farmer.

The cadets also plan to do a variety of other fund-raising projects, including a food drive and pancake breakfast.

Soviets let journalists see test site

By The Associated Press

IN THE GEGELEN HILLS, Kazakhstan, U.S.S.R. — Army generals opened their secret nuclear test range here for a group of Soviet and foreign journalists, showing a silent, rusted site that they said proved the Kremlin had banned nuclear tests.

Two Soviet generals on hand for the tour Saturday made it clear the visit was arranged to reinforce Moscow's appeals to the United States to join the moratorium on nuclear tests begun by the Kremlin in August 1985.

"The aim of our journey is to show you that our test site is silent. We would like it to remain that way forever," said Gen. Yuri V. Lebedev, who flew with the group to the Central Asian site.

The journalists and official escorts left Moscow on Friday in a special Aeroflot Tu-134 jet to the city of Semipalatinsk in the northeast corner of Kazakhstan, about 370 miles from the border with China.

A smaller plane ferried the group from Semipalatinsk to the garrison for the test area, an unnamed and uncharted town along the Irtysh River. From there the visitors traveled by Mi6 helicopter over salt lakes and herds of wildlife to the foothills of the Gegelen range.

Rusted piles of abandoned machinery and huge natural granite formations crumbled by the force of earlier nuclear blasts give the steppes the look of an open-pit mine.

Rusted rail tracks run to corroded iron doors closing off unused tunnels bored for tests.

The moratorium was declared on the 40th anniversary of the Aug. 6, 1945, nuclear attack on Hiroshima, Japan, by the United States toward the end of World War II.

Israeli expert tracks terrorist leader

By The Associated Press

Terrorist leader Abu Nidal, feeling the U.S. heat, has decamped from his Libyan headquarters and begun shuttling secretively among Arab capitals, says an Israeli expert on the notorious Palestinian fugitive.

Yossi Melman also writes that Israeli intelligence officials suspect Abu Nidal, blamed by some for the recent Pan Am hijacking in Pakistan and the Istanbul synagogue massacre, has ties to East European secret services.

"Abu Nidal's organization is the only one which is able to maintain a secret infrastructure in Eastern Europe," Melman says in his new book "The Master Terrorist."

The 215-page study, published by Adama Books of New York, is the most thorough summation yet of the deadly career of the 49-year-old Abu Nidal, born Sabry al-Banna. And it makes clear that his group, formally called Fatah-Revolutionary Council, is by far the single greatest Palestinian terrorist threat.

Israeli intelligence specialists blame Abu Nidal for more than 100 terror attacks and 200 deaths over 13 years, Melman reports.

Major recent attacks include last year's bombings of British and Jordanian airline offices, a cafe in Rome, hotels in Greece and the gun-and-grenade slaughter of 16 people at Rome and Vienna airports last Dec. 27.

Israeli and other specialists suggest Abu Nidal also may have plotted two shocking attacks earlier this month — the Pan Am jetliner hijacking at Karachi airport, in which 20 people died, and the massacre of 21 Jewish worshipers at a synagogue in Istanbul, Turkey.

In his book, Melman, who is diplomatic correspondent of the Israeli newspaper Davar, relies heavily on official Israeli sources. But much of his detailed knowledge of the terror group derives from his own coverage of the London trial of three alleged Abu Nidal agents convicted in the near-fatal shooting of the Israeli ambassador to Britain in 1982.

Melman, citing Israeli and Western intelligence sources, says the Abu Nidal group has no more than 150-200 active members, drawn from two main sources: Palestinian students in Europe and Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon.

Abu Nidal, Arabic for "Father of Struggle," broke away from Yasser Arafat's Fatah guerrilla group in 1974 and founded his own organization in Baghdad, Iraq, with the help of the Iraqi intelligence service, Melman says.

He moved his headquarters to Damascus, Syria, in 1982 to draw closer to the Palestinian mainstream, and carried out anti-Jordanian attacks in Europe for the Syrian security services, the author writes.

In mid-1985, Abu Nidal moved again, this time establishing his command in Libya, Melman says, although his organization still maintains an office in Damascus.

After the Rome-Vienna attacks, the U.S. government charged that Libyan leader Moammar Ghadafi was behind the Abu Nidal killers, and U.S. warplanes in April bombed Ghadafi's Tripoli headquarters in retaliation.

Abu Nidal now "continues to move about under forged passports."

Chinese students, friends celebrate nation's history

By The Collegian Staff

Faculty, students and friends joined the Chinese Student Friendship Association as they celebrated the 37th anniversary of the foundation of the People's Republic of China at a reception held Sunday evening at Pottorf Hall in Cico Park.

The Chinese Student Friendship Association began in 1983 and has a membership of 90 students. About 95 percent of these students are graduate students, said Dalin Nie, president of the student friendship association and graduate student in agronomy.

All the students were gathered not only to celebrate their country's foundation but to give their thanks to the faculty and friends at K-State, Nie said.

The reception featured a Chinese dinner along with a slide show on the highlights of China. Other attractions were a video tape of the Chinese Acrobats and dancing — all to celebrate China and give thanks to K-State.

Nie said it was a great honor to have so many American friends present to help in giving best wishes to the Chinese student's home nation that contains over 1 billion inhabitants. The students won't forget the University and the people when they apply their completed education toward a successful China, he said.

"We want our country to be the best, that's why we came here, for the chance and opportunity," Nie said. "We want to thank those who made it possible."

Because China has made great advances, it is no longer looked down upon by other nations, although it still needs

Scorpions benefit Mexican city

DURANGO, Mexico — Savvy entrepreneurs have turned the menace of Durango, the deadly scorpion, into an unofficial symbol of state pride, and a big tourist business.

The "alacran," or scorpion, which can pack potentially lethal poison in the stinger of its tiny tail, is turning up on the shelves of this capital city's central market and gift and souvenir shops.

Most, however, are frozen forever in clear acrylic and mounted on tourist gifts such as ashtrays, napkin holders, keychains, earrings, wooden boxes and Western-style string neckties.

"They're a curiosity," said Carmen Moreno, who sells the novelties in the huge market.

Author B. Traven was referring to gold, not scorpions, when he titled his 1934 book "The Treasure of the Sierra Madre." Durango, which Traven called "the lovely jewel of the Sierra Madre," is Mexico's fourth largest state in land mass and its leading producer of gold.

The city of Durango is 578 miles northwest of Mexico City and 675 miles south of the Texas border at El Paso. Its 1.8 million people, affectionately nicknamed "scorpions," also make their living from agriculture, cattle ranching, forestry and mining of other metals such as silver and iron.

Durango's soccer team is called the Scorpions and the women of Durango also are sometimes known as "alacranas," female scorpions.

A vigorous eradication program has greatly reduced the number of scorpions found in the cities.

Telephone therapy stirs debate

MINNEAPOLIS — People who need counseling can turn to an increasing number of telephone therapists who offer their clients the convenience and privacy of not having to leave their home or office.

Psychologist Marilyn F. Mason operates Tele-Psych Inc. in Minneapolis and says many of her clients are male executives too busy to visit her in person or concerned about being seen entering a psychologist's office.

Some psychologists, however, aren't sure such services are in the client's best interest.

"We have some concerns about doing therapy in this way," said David H. Mills, ethics director of the Washington-based American Psychological Association. "Our ethics code says psychotherapy is done in the context of a personal visit."

The association has no rules governing telephone psychologists, who have been cropping up across the country in increasing numbers, Mills said. But guidelines will probably be adopted by the end of January, he said.

The names used by telephone psychologists, such as Shrink Link in New York and Dial-a-Shrink in Los Angeles, are troubling, Mills said.

Mason, who opened a traditional practice in January and added telephone service in May, charges $20 for the first 10 minutes, $11 for an additional 10 minutes, payable through major credit cards. For an hour chat, her fee is $75, $5 more than she charges for an office visit.

Mason maintains that telephone counseling differs little from the work of traditional psychologists. But she is quick to point out the limitations of working by phone, and her flyers say she makes referrals when necessary.

Mason insists she isn't offering therapy by telephone. "You can't give therapy in two or three minutes. That's not credible," she said.

Still, she maintains she can help people with their problems "A lot of people who call sort of have an idea of where they want to go but don't trust their own judgment," Mason said.

Shultz negotiating Daniloff release

NEW YORK — Secretary of State George Shultz met Sunday evening with Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze in a fresh attempt to win the release of American reporter Nicholas Daniloff, U.S. officials said.

Shultz had no comments for reporters as he and his aides left his hotel for the Soviet United Nations mission shortly after 8 p.m.

Shultz was hoping to make progress on the Daniloff case and other problems before Shevardnadze's scheduled departure Tuesday for Canada.

The two met here three times last week.

Shultz returned here Sunday afternoon after spending Friday and Saturday in Washington.

Asked by reporters at 6:30 p.m. in his hotel lobby if he planned to meet Sunday night with Shevardnadze, the secretary of state said only that he had a dinner engagement with tennis star Ivan Lendl with whom he had played tennis earlier in the day.

But other officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Shultz and Shevardnadze would meet later on.

The Daniloff case is one of several obstacles blocking progress on scheduling a second summit meeting between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

Milk River floods Montana towns

SACO, Mont. — Residents of this small farming and ranching town stood guard behind sandbags and dikes as a major creek rose steadily Sunday, and more than 300 people had been evacuated from flooded towns of the Milk River.

Downpours of 5 to 8 inches of rain in northern Montana gorged the Milk and its tributaries late last week, killing one woman at Harlem, drowning hundreds of head of livestock and cutting roads and railroads, officials said.

At Saco, Beaver Creek was rising Sunday and Mayor Gregg Menge said standing water 3 to 4 feet deep and several miles wide flooded the area west of town known as the Saco Flats.

To the west at Chinook, where about 125 people were evacuated Saturday, National Guard troops were sent home Sunday after they patrolled the dikes overnight, and officials said the flooding had stabilized.

Weinberger hopes to reduce arms

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said Sunday he hopes the superpowers will agree this year to reduce their arsenals of intermediate and long-range nuclear missiles, but indicated the Soviet Union has yet to offer an acceptable verification plan.

And "it might very well be that we can't even talk about it if the Soviets persist in holding Mr. (Nicholas) Daniloff, an innocent American," Weinberger said.

Weinberger, interviewed on the NBC program " Meet the Press," made it clear he believes the verification issue remains a major sticking point in arms control even though " the Soviets are talking about some very deep reductions now" on both medium-range and strategic missiles.

Other adminstration officials recently have expressed optimism that, at the least, an agreement on medium-range missiles in Europe could be concluded at a prospective summit meeting late this year between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. And they have pointed to a recent pact in Stockholm as a possible precursor of further Soviet concessions in the verification area.

Leadership workshop develops student skills

By MARY LYNN GATSCHET
Collegian Reporter

University President Jon Wefald was one of more than a dozen leadership experts who gave their formulas for success to students Saturday morning at a leadership workshop called "Take the Steps to Leadership."

In his opening remarks in the Union Little Theatre, Wefald outlined ingredients common to most leaders on the student, governmental and business levels.

"For one thing, you need to have an agenda — a vision for what it is you think needs to be changed," Wefald said.

His list also included characteristics such as good communication and decision-making skills, a consistency of values, respect for people and the ability to work hard.

Wefald said that in one respect, students today have it easier than past generations due to high-technology communication systems.

"But this era of video cassettes and televison, in one way, makes it harder for you to develop these leadership skills," Wefald said. "And I don't care how sophisticated our civilization gets. There will be no substitute for being able to read, for being able to write and for being able to represent yourself effectively."

Wefald's final point was that leaders must like themselves and have confidence.

"People who make it to the top are those who get knocked down and get back up," he said. "Don't worry about setbacks and criticism. They set high goals and they work, work, work, to achieve those goals."

The workshop, held every semester, is directed by Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities. The fall semester workshop is focused toward students in overall leadership roles, new students and any individual interested in improving motivation, communication and time-management skills and accomplishing goals.

The spring workshop is required for all candidates running for student government offices and, thus, addresses specific needs for these individuals. Routson said she was pleased with this semester's speakers, assistance from Blue Key and students' responses.

Frank Amundaray, senior in life sciences, said he has active leadership roles as president of Newman Services and chairman of the KSU Committee on Religion.

"I went mainly because I wanted to improve myself," Amundaray said. "The program was presented in a way that got students involved, so you can go back and feel like you can really solve your problems and help with your group's problems."

The workshop was divided into four, 45-minute time blocks.

Dave Hartnett, assistant professor of biology, shows visitors of the Konza Prairie Research Area Saturday afternoon various aspects of how a watershed is monitored. Approximately 1,400 people visited the Konza Saturday for the visitors' day, 200 more than attended in 1984.

Visitors view Konza Prairie research

By JOHN THELANDER
Collegian Reporter

Approximately 1,400 people participated in Visitors' Day Saturday at the Konza Prairie Natural Research Area, located southeast of Manhattan on McDowell Creek Road.

The Konza, where K-State scientists conduct ecological research, usually is closed to the public due to the delicate nature of the research.

About 200 more people attended Saturday's event than attended the last visitors' day in the fall of 1984, said John Zimmerman, Konza scientist and professor of the Division of Biology.

Visitors' Day activities were a slide show, hikes, hayrack rides and other activities demonstrating the types of research being done at the Konza.

The hikes, ranging in length from one-half mile to four miles, allowed participants to see the effects of periodical range burning on the productivity of the prairie and its community.

Native herbivores, such as bison, elk and antelope, are to be stocked in the next few years in specially constructed eight-foot fences. The smooth, electric fences, designed for animals such as bison, are designed with a degree of elasticity to reduce the chance of injury to a charging buffalo.

Dave Hartnett, assistant professor of biology, said deer can easily jump over the fences.

Participants also were able to view a display of small animals found on the prairie and posters describing the area's history and research.

The Konza headquarters is located on the site of the historic Dewey Ranch. The limestone house and barn on the site were built in 1911 and 1912. In addition to the ranch, the Deweys were co-founders of the First National Bank of Manhattan, a livery stable and a resort west of Manhattan.

The research area's name was derived from one of more than 100 variations in the spelling of the name of the American Indian tribe.

Graduate's study earns top dissertation award

By SCOTT SHORTER
Collegian Reporter

A recent K-State graduate has received the Edgar L. Morphet Outstanding Dissertation Award for her doctoral dissertation in the area of education.

Darcy Rourk, first-year principal at Eugene Field School in Manhattan, researched staff development and its relationship to the actual organization — the school. The emphasis was that teachers need to continue their education to keep up with new ideas and innovations, Rourk said.

She did a case study of Ogden Elementary School to see if staff development works in the system.

"I almost moved into the school for three weeks," Rourk said. "I talked to all the teachers and observed the workings of the school.

"I did an analysis of the documents that went out of the school, also. It was like taking a picture of school life, and that, to me, was real interesting."

Rourk started collecting data and talking to and observing the teachers in December 1985. Then she spent a concentrated month in Febuary putting all the information together.

"It took many long hours, day and night," she said. Rourk was finished with the dissertation by March 1986 and graduated this spring.

"The reason I started my studies was I saw that education was changing," she said. "I felt I wanted to be part of the decision making that was going to go on."

Rourk said she also saw this as a step toward a higher administrative position, although she really likes the job she has now because she gets to interact with children.

"I really enjoy that part of my job and I would not want to give that up right now," she said.

Rourk heard Secretary of Education William Bennett speak Sept. 9 at the Landon Lecture Series. She did not agree with his idea that anyone who has knowledge in a particular field can teach.

"There is more to teaching than just knowing the subject," she said.

Rourk did agree with Bennett by saying history should be taught in the schools. But after 12 years' teaching experience, she said she would place her priorities in a different order.

"I would place more emphasis on language arts and less on the social sciences and humanities," she said. "If a child does not have a good foundation in these areas, then he really can't move on to the other subjects."

Rourk has taught in the Manhattan school district for 12 years. She said she is currently not involved in any research project.

Rourk received both her bachelor's and master's degrees at K-State.

Weekend vehicle accidents involve pedestrian, passenger

By The Collegian Staff

A K-State student received minor injuries when she was struck by a car Friday afternoon.

Jacinda Zimmerman, freshman in business administration, was hit by a car Friday while crossing a crosswalk at Anderson Avenue and Mid-Campus Drive. Zimmerman was hit by Elizabeth Baxter, 2215 Anderson Ave., a Riley County police report said.

Zimmerman was hit when she crossed Anderson Avenue against the pedestrian crosswalk signal, said Riley County police officer Kent Bratton.

"No charges have been filed as of yet," Bratton said. "It's still under investigation."

Zimmerman, who received minor injuries from the accident, was taken to Lafene Student Health Center, where she was given stitches above her right eye.

In another incident, Brad A. Lyden, 3825 Button Road, Topeka, received injuries from an accident on 11th Street and Bluemont Avenue Saturday at approximately 9:30 p.m.

Riley County police officer Larry Davis said Lyden was a passenger in a pickup driven by Gregory Eckart of Wamego. Eckart was driving east on Bluemont Avenue when he made a left turn on 11th Street. During the turn, Lyden fell out of Eckart's pickup.

Lyden received cuts to his face, arms and back. He was taken to The Saint Mary Hospital, where he was treated and released.

No charges had been filed on Sunday.

Students must accept expenses of coliseum

"Hallelujah! We finally got it." George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, proclaimed triumphantly last week.

The "it" was the redesigned Fred Bramlage Coliseum, which was finalized after bids amounted to $1.3 million less than the $15,923,000 construction budget. The extra money will be used for additions to enhance the coliseum.

Despite the athletic department's $2 million commitment to the coliseum, a commitment it cannot pay; despite dropping attendance at basketball games; despite poor planning and lack of market and pro forma studies; and despite the coliseum's utility costs, which may be as much as $1 million a year, the administration "finally got it."

It took a good deal of finagling to "get it." When the original bids were more than $3.4 million over budget, the architects were authorized to redesign the structure and ultimately cut corners. When students raised questions about the lack of planning and asked to stop collection of student fees until proper planning was demonstrated, their pleas were ignored or dismissed as a lack of purple pride.

Students, who were originally expected to pay $6 million for the coliseum, were roped into paying $7 million. Because the second round of bids are $1.3 million under budget, a million dollar refund to the students would be in order.

However, such a plan would cause difficulties. With its not wholly undeserved reputation for frivolous spending, would Student Senate be authorized to spend the money as it sees fit? Would the money be channeled into other projects, while the coliseum's financial future, with its estimated million dollar per year utility costs and $2 million athletic department debt, remains unclear?

Unfortunately, the administration's self-protective procedures have ensured that students are left with no alternative but to agree with the administration's decision to use the money for additions to the coliseum.

Students would like to have a coliseum of which they can be proud. The additions will be a move in that direction. However, the additions failed to include provisions for accoustics that would have made the coliseum a multi-purpose building.

It is unfortunate that while the administration "finally got it," students feel like they got taken.

Senators should OK higher retirement age

A step was taken Tuesday to stop discrimination against the elderly.

The House of Representatives unanimously passed a bill eliminating mandatory retirement at any age and requiring continued health coverage for people over the age of 70, with the exception of firefighters and police officers. Retirement ages for these two groups will continue to be set by state and local governments.

While this measure will increase the number of people in an already overcrowded job market, younger Americans should take into account the feelings of their parents and grandparents who are reaching retirement age. In addition, younger adults should look toward to the future and imagine how they would feel if forced to retire at a certain age.

Without a mandatory retirement, the older adult's income could remain at the level to which one is accustomed, creating a relatively stable base for the person. When members of the older adult community retire, many find it hard to survive on Social Security incomes.

Furthermore, cuts in social services may create uncertainties about the incomes of older adults.

Perhaps the most vital factor this bill introduces is the continued use of older Americans in the work force.

For some, retirement is looked upon as a chance for freedom, liberation from working responsibilities, an opportunity to travel and additional time to pursue hobbies and interests.

But by forcing a worker to retire at a certain age, he may feel useless not only to his employer but to himself as well. The older adult who is forced to retire often loses the desire to explore new subjects, keep up with timely issues and stimulate his mind in general. Why should he bother when he isn't of use to anyone?

It is criminal to cut off older adults in what may be their "prime," leaving them with an apathetic view of life.

The elimination of the mandatory retirement law is a step toward the advancement of the rights of older adults. All adults, young and old, should stand behind this vital issue.

U.S. shows tyranny in Guatemala

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

Americans are generally good people. Sure, there are a few bad apples, but most have a commitment to the principles of peace, liberty and freedom. However, a few bad apples can spoil the lot.

In the case of the United States, the bad apples are the people running the country. They lack all of the aforementioned principles. There are few better examples of their tyranny than the nightmare of Guatemala.

The history of Guatemala is similar to those of its Central American neighbors. Guatemala was ruled by a series of dictators for decades. Most of the land was owned by the wealthy, and there were vagrancy laws similar to those in other area countries.

The vagrancy laws required peasants to show proof of employment to any official upon request. If they could not produce this proof, they were arrested and sold like slaves to wealthy landowners for a period of time. This prevented the peasants from striking out on their own and doomed them to a life of slavery.

The situation lasted until 1944 when demonstrations and a student strike forced the dictatorship of Jorge Ubico to end. The next year, Juan Jose Arevalo was elected president. He was a university professor who believed in "spiritual socialism." Arevalo oversaw the writing of a new constitution and encouraged workers and peasants to organize unions. Industrial wages went up 80 percent during his five-year term. During this time he survived 22 military revolts. Democracy prevailed.

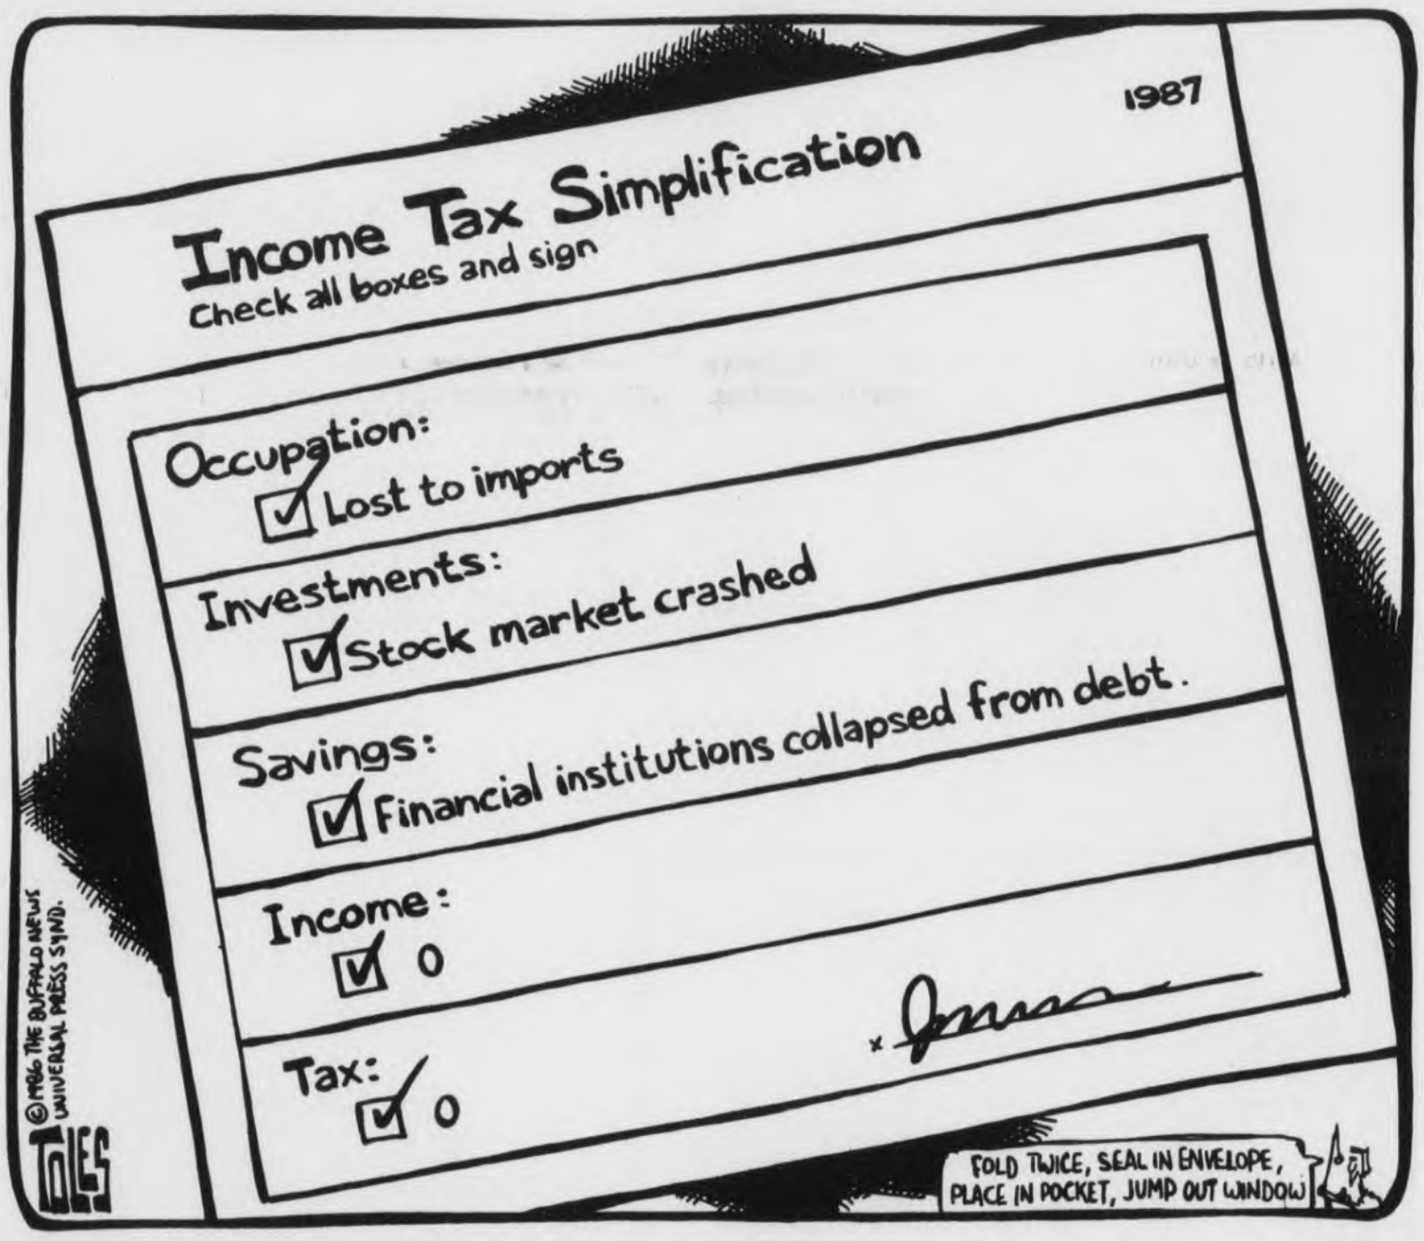
In 1950, Jacobo Arbenz was elected Arevalo's successor. The new president took a more active approch to the idea of liberal reform. His plan was to help the peasant majority by redistributing wealth through means of an income tax and agrarian reform. He distributed 1.5 million acres of land to 100,000 familes. It included 1,700 acres of Arbenz' own land.

The new president soon ran into trouble, and trouble's name was Uncle Sam. The U.S.-owned United Fruit Company owned enormous tracts of land in Guatemala. Arbenz tried to expropriate the unused parts of UFCO's land, which added up to 85 percent of its holdings.

Then there was a large dispute about compensation. On the basis of tax declarations, the government offered UFCO $627,527 for one portion of this property. The U.S. State Department, acting on behalf of UFCO, demanded $15,845,849. Obviously, UFCO had been cheating on its taxes and its mistake was going to cost.

This confrontation with UFCO was a dangerous move because UFCO had some powerful friends. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles and his brother, CIA director Allen Dulles, were members of the law firm that represented UFCO. Also, United Nations Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge was on the board of directors of UFCO. The outlook for Guatemala was not good.

Being at the height of the McCarthy era, a red-baiting campaign was launched to gain the support of the American people. The Guatemalan government was labeled "Communist," a claim that was completely false. President Eisenhower, who also had close ties to UFCO, embarked on a classic program of destablization. This included economic sanctions and CIA covert activity. In 1954, a CIA-sponsored invasion was successful in gaining control from Arbenz, ending Guatemala's short try at democracy.



The new military government brought back policies of the old dictators in a more brutal form. Communists and radical nationalists were purged from the government by execution or exile. Death squads roamed the countryside, using fear as a weapon against the people. These forces indiscriminately killed tens of thousands of people and terrified the population into paralysis.

The killing is still going on, even though there was a civilian president elected earlier this year. The military has the real control. Vinicio Cerezo, the new president, has survived three assassination attemps by the army. To be allowed to serve as president, Cerezo had to limit his goals to standards that the military could accept. The president is little more than a figurehead in this land of horrors. More than 50,000 people have died at the hands of the military since the 1954 coup.

Many of these abuses are public knowledge. In 1979, the National Police announced that between January and October, 1,224 "criminals" had been killed by the Death Squad and 3,252 "subversives" by the Secret Anti-Communist Army. This practice of revealing details was soon discontinued, but the killing goes on.

There have even been reports of the Guatemalan Army entering Mexican territory. Here, they have attacked refugee camps and have slaughtered helpless people fleeing the country in fear. The indiscriminate bombing and free-fire zones have driven many thousands out of the country. The United States fails to recognize these people as political refugees and sends them back to the horror show.

The problem that confronts the good apples in America is the fact that we are paying for the bullets that kill innocent people in planned acts of political repression. Military aid has been continued without fuss in Congress. The worst human-rights abuser in this hemisphere conducts its war against the people largely unnoticed. It is time for the American people to stand up and see the light.

Road trips make college life easier

TRACY CARLILE
Collegian Columnist

Have you recently felt a need to get away, not only from the weekly grind of school, but also from this "home away from home," Manhattan?

It's that time of the semester when "the academic life" has become a real drag, and it's begun to cut in on extracurricular activities.

The roommates have left a sink full of dirty dishes and toothpaste all over the bathroom mirror for the 12th consecutive day. You try to relax and get away from it all with a little Music Television and liquid refreshment, but you can't find the television because of all the clothes on the floor. And that cool, refreshing drink just won't be the same without any ice. Some people seem to think ice cube trays can refill themselves, or at least they always did when Mom was around.

Stifle the urge to strangle, smother or hang the roommates from their toenails. They do pay the rent.

If you think you'll lose your sanity if you stay in Manhattan another day, and you believe you're afflicted with some stress-related terminal illness, you deserve a break, preferably a cheap one because money is more scarce than a Wildcat victory these days.

A weekend spent at home with Mom and Dad is easy on the wallet, and the stomach will certainly appreciate all that home cooking. However, in such desperate straits, is it really fair to inflict the temporary insanity on parents? A desperate situation calls for a radical solution. It's time for a road trip!

We all have a bit of "party animal-warrior-maniac" in us somewhere, and what better way to release tension and get a much needed new perspective on life than to escape for a weekend-long party? You don't have to travel far or spend much, especially if you have friends in nearby "fun" places. If these friends are living "life in the yuppie lane," they might be willing to share their newly found wealth with you (i.e., they buy the beer).

There are several prime road-trip locations within three or four hours of the Little Apple. One can't call himself or herself a tried and true K-State fan until he or she has made at least one expedition to the K-State vs. University of Kansas football game in Lawrence.

Another cheap and guaranteed good time is a road trip to a friend's hometown. Though it may not be quite what they've bragged upon incessantly, it's sure to be fun and will make their parents extremely happy to meet some of Junior's friends.

In the never-ending search for cultural enlightenment, students should visit other college towns to see how their peers live. Hays, known to some as the "party capital of western Kansas," is a good time, especially during Octoberfest. It's an opportunity to see how Fort Hays State University students earned their "party animal" reputation. Everyone should experience the atmosphere of Hays' bars, particularly if they're burned out on Aggieville.

Speaking of cultural enlightenment, Kansas City is a great place to combine culture with partying, and almost everyone at K-State knows someone there from whom he or she can mooch some "tour guiding" and a place to sleep. Students can take a break from University spectator sports and catch the Royals or Chiefs in action. They can also window shop on the Plaza or be a kid for a day at Worlds of Fun.

The night life can't be topped for miles around Kansas City. A horse-drawn carriage ride around the Plaza during the Christmas season is an ultimate evening experience. Drop in at any bar in Westport and find all your friends, or stop by the guaranteed fun "private party." As a recent participant (or "victim" perhaps), I had a great time, but paid for it dearly the next day.

Even if you do come home more tired and a few dollars more broke than when you left, you'll come home realizing how fun this "college experience" can be. This may be the last real chance you'll have to "cut loose" and act a bit immature and not have to pay the consequences (i.e., facing a 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. job Monday feeling H.B.C.'d — hit by car).

If nothing else, a good road trip is guaranteed to keep a big grin on your face for a little while. You'll be a lot easier to live with and find life a lot easier to live.

Slides show Nicaragua 'first-hand'

By The Collegian Staff

Those attending the Friday Focus on Women had a chance to visit Nicaragua through slides and experiences shared by Susan Angle, counselor at the Counseling Center.

As one of 30 people from the Presbyterian Church's Synod of Mid-America to travel to Nicaragua last March, Angle said she received a first-hand glimpse at some of the Third World countries of Central America.

Lay people were predominant on the trip, although several participants were women who shared the same ideological conviction of peace. Angle, a member of the First Presbyterian Church, 801 Leavenworth, was the only participant from Manhattan.

Most of the Nicaraguans were friendly, she said, but didn't feel they could share freely with the Manhattan group because of reproach from the Contras.

One highlight of the group's visit was an eight-mile walk for peace from San Mateo to Managua, where they had an opportunity to visit with the people, she said.

Angle said she learned women in Nicaragua have just begun to recognize their status in society.

But she said they also encountered a missionary group from a Bible church in Costa Rica that believed women could not be ordained in the church. They also could not have authority over men and were not considered the equals of men.

This was the first time she had ever been face-to-face with someone who said she wasn't their equal, Angle said.

For the most part, she said, the Presbyterian Church played an active, positive part in the revolution.

"They (Nicaraguans) were quite religious and believed the revolution and the freedom they would gain would be a part of their Christianity," Angle said.

The foremost fear of the people is that the United States is going to invade their country. Nicaragua has been invaded nine times since 1920.

Angle said that what she learned during her visit created a deep commitment to the area and the people as well as the peace issue of the Presbyterian Church.

Johnson to live in dorms for week

By The Collegian Staff

The student body president is making it easier for certain students to get in touch with him.

Steven Johnson, student body president and junior in agricultural economics, is living in three different residence halls for a week to learn about the interests of students living there, said Gary Stark, public relations director for the student body president and senior in accounting.

Johnson moved into Goodnow Hall on Friday and spent three days there. He is moving into Putnam Hall today for two days and Haymaker Hall for two days, Stark said.

The idea was mostly Johnson's, Stark said. However, Stark and Kerri Weddle, president of Association of Residence Halls and junior in pre-professional secondary education, helped coordinate it.

A misconception seems to exist among residence halls that the Student Governing Association consists mostly of greeks, Stark said. After this week, it is hoped students in residence halls will realize that SGA is not only concerned with greeks, but all students, he said.

"Steve's a good listener and he's concerned with all students' thoughts," Stark said.

The idea originated from the living exchange greek houses have with one another.

Duel among NCAA's best won by Arkansas women

Staff/Andy Nelson

Coach John Capriotti huddles with the women's cross country team for a pre-race talk to encourage a good showing at the inaugural KSU Open Saturday at Warner Park. The team placed second behind the University of Arkansas.

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Coming into the inaugural KSU Open cross country meet, K-State Coach John Capriotti knew his women's team would have their hands full against the Arkansas Razorbacks, who defeated the K-State women in the Missouri Invitational Sept. 13.

Arkansas, a perennial cross country powerhouse, edged K-State by 11 points to capture the meet at the recently completed Warner Park course. The Razorbacks tallied 38 points to edge K-State's final total of 49.

The women were paced by junior Alysun Deckert who captured a second-place finish with a clocking of 17 minutes, 47.40 seconds in the five-kilometer race. Oklahoma State's Veronica Haberl mastered the Warner Park course in 17:21.22 to grab the gold medal.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Alysun Deckert is congratulated on her second-place finish after running the five-kilometer course in 17 minutes, 47.40 seconds to pace the women's team.

"Alysun ran real well," Capriotti said. "She can run better, yet. This is a good breakthrough for her. It (No. 2 finish) didn't surprise me as much as it did some others because she has been really coming on lately."

"I knew I had to place high up to help the team out," Deckert said. "I knew (Arkansas) would be tough. They run together and they beat me before.

"I think this will help me. It was a positive experience for me. When I look back at this meet and know how well I did, then I think it will help me do better in those (later) races."

K-State was without the services of All-American Jacque Struckhoff, who did not compete but is expected to be healed from a leg injury that has hampered her training this season.

'Arkansas beat us by 28 points earlier this year, so we closed the gap on them some.'
— John Capriotti

Coach John Capriotti also scratched Chris Vanatta from the meet on Friday because of a sore Achilles tendon.

"The women ran a good race," Capriotti said. "Arkansas beat us by 28 points earlier this year, so we closed the gap on them some. I think that is impressive without Jacque and Chris running for us."

Other finishers for the Wildcat women were Anneli Edling (sixth), Angie Barry (eighth), Betsy Silzer (15th) and Nancy Hoffman (18th).

Capriotti praised the efforts of Barry and Silzer. Silzer, an All-American who was redshirted last season due to injuries, ran her first race in more than two years Saturday.

Capriotti said Barry has been the biggest surprise for the women so far this season.

"Overall, I feel real satisfied with my race," Barry said. "It was a good, strong race. As compared to how I was running last year, I feel a lot better this year. My first year was more of an adjustment. I'm feeling a lot stronger this year."

Capriotti said he still believes the Wildcat women can contend for the Big Eight title and a top national finish. His optimism flourishes on the depth of the team and the addition of some quality runners this season to last year's No. 7 NCAA national finisher.

"We are right on schedule — I'm excited," Capriotti said of the team. "We have to continue to get people healthy and get the people who are not running in some races...We need to get Chris and Jacque back."

Staff/Andy Nelson

Anneli Edeling strides across a bridge on her way to a sixth-place finish on the newly completed Warner Park course. K-State placed three women runners in the top 10.

Ron Stahl nears the finish line and a fifth-place finish to lead the men's team. The K-State men finished third behind the University of Arkansas and the University of Colorado, respectively.

Awesome Razorback racers capture men's division title

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

K-State's men's cross country team met the finely tuned, well-publicized Arkansas running machine on Saturday, and the Wildcat harriers found out firsthand how well the Razorbacks can operate.

Arkansas, "far and away the best team in the nation," according to K-State Coach John Capriotti, strutted its stuff on the new layout at Warner Park to capture the university men's division of the KSU Open Saturday in impressive fashion.

The Razorbacks totalled just 24 points to easily outdistance runner-up Colorado (52 points) and third-place K-State (82 points).

The Wildcats were led by Ron Stahl who completed the new course in 24 minutes, 59.65 seconds. Stahl's time was good enough for fifth-place honors in the meet.

"I thought I did as well as can be expected," Stahl said. "This gives me a good indication of where I can stack up nationally.

"I can go to all the rest of the meets and I won't meet the competition I hit Saturday. I want to be an All-American this year, so this gives me an indication of what I need to do."

Arkansas' Joe Falcon captured the gold medal in the men's race when he crossed the tape at 24:29.26. For the meet, Arkansas placed three runners in the top five with first-, second- and fourth-place finishes.

Capriotti said he was pleased with the men's showing, especially since K-State's No. 2 and 3 runners were absent from the race.

Jim Knudsen and Jan Jonsson were held out of the meet and aren't expected to run for another three or four weeks. Knudsen has lower-back pains, and Jonsson is being rested for the time being, Capriotti said.

"We got beat by two teams that were second and third in the NCAA last year," Capriotti said. "I think, considering who we ran against, we did great. We beat four other Big Eight teams without our No. 2 and 3 runners in there."

David Warders captured 16th place for K-State, followed by Robbie Hays (18th), Pat Hessini (23rd), David Keller (24th) and Matt Vavala (32nd).

"Our young guys did a great job," Capriotti said. "I was really happy with them. Pat Hessini didn't have a great race, but even on a bad day he showed he can run."

The Wildcats also received high marks for the new layout at Warner Park that was completed earlier this semester by the track coaching staff.

"It was great. It went over well," Capriotti said of the course which will also be used for the Big Eight meet on Nov. 1. "Everybody said good things about it."

Lowery's field goal guides Kansas City past Buffalo, 20-17

By The Associated Press

ORCHARD PARK, N.Y. — Nick Lowery kicked a 46-yard field goal with 1:07 left in the game to give the Kansas City Chiefs a 20-17 victory over the Buffalo Bills Sunday.

The Chiefs scored twice in the game's final five minutes to take the win and were helped when Buffalo quarterback Jim Kelly threw an interception to Deron Cherry late in the fourth quarter after the Chiefs had scored the tying touchdown.

Cherry's interception gave Kansas City the ball at the Buffalo 45 with 3:58 to play in the game and the Chiefs drove close enough for Lowery's field goal, which snapped a 17-17 tie.

The win broke an eight-game road losing streak for Kansas City, 3-1, while the loss dropped the Bills to 1-3.

Kansas City quarterback Todd Blackledge threw touchdown passes to Stephone Paige and Paul Coffman, while Lowery also had a 24-yard field goal for the Chiefs.

Buffalo's scoring came on a 41-yard run by Robb Riddick, playing for the injured Greg Bell, a 14-yard pass from Kelly to rookie Ronnie Harmon and a 32-yard Scott Norwood field goal.

The Bills came from a 10-7 halftime deficit to take the lead early in the fourth quarter, but the Chiefs then erased that seven-point Buffalo lead.

Kelly, who missed several minutes of playing time in the second quarter with a bruised left arm suffered when he was sacked, led the Bills on an 80-yard drive in the third quarter that ended with a 14-yard touchdown pass to Harmon that gave Buffalo a 14-10 lead.

Buffalo increased the lead to 17-10 early in the fourth quarter following a seven-minute drive that ended with Norwood's 32-yard field goal.

But the Chiefs then began a long drive of their own, moving the ball from their own 28 to the Buffalo 1. An interference call in the end zone by Buffalo's Charles Romes on third down allowed Blackledge to find Coffman alone in the end zone for the 1-yard touchdown pass that tied it at 17 with 4:08 to play.

Buffalo took the opening kickoff and threw six passes during a 11-play drive that ended with Riddick's 41-yard touchdown run.

The Chiefs also scored on their first possession, moving 75 yards before the Buffalo defense stopped them at the Bills 6. Lowery then connected on a 24-yard field goal.

The Bills were driving at the end of the first quarter when Kelly was decked by linebacker Tim Cofield after throwing a pass.

Ironman improves relations

By MELISSA RANSON
Collegian Reporter

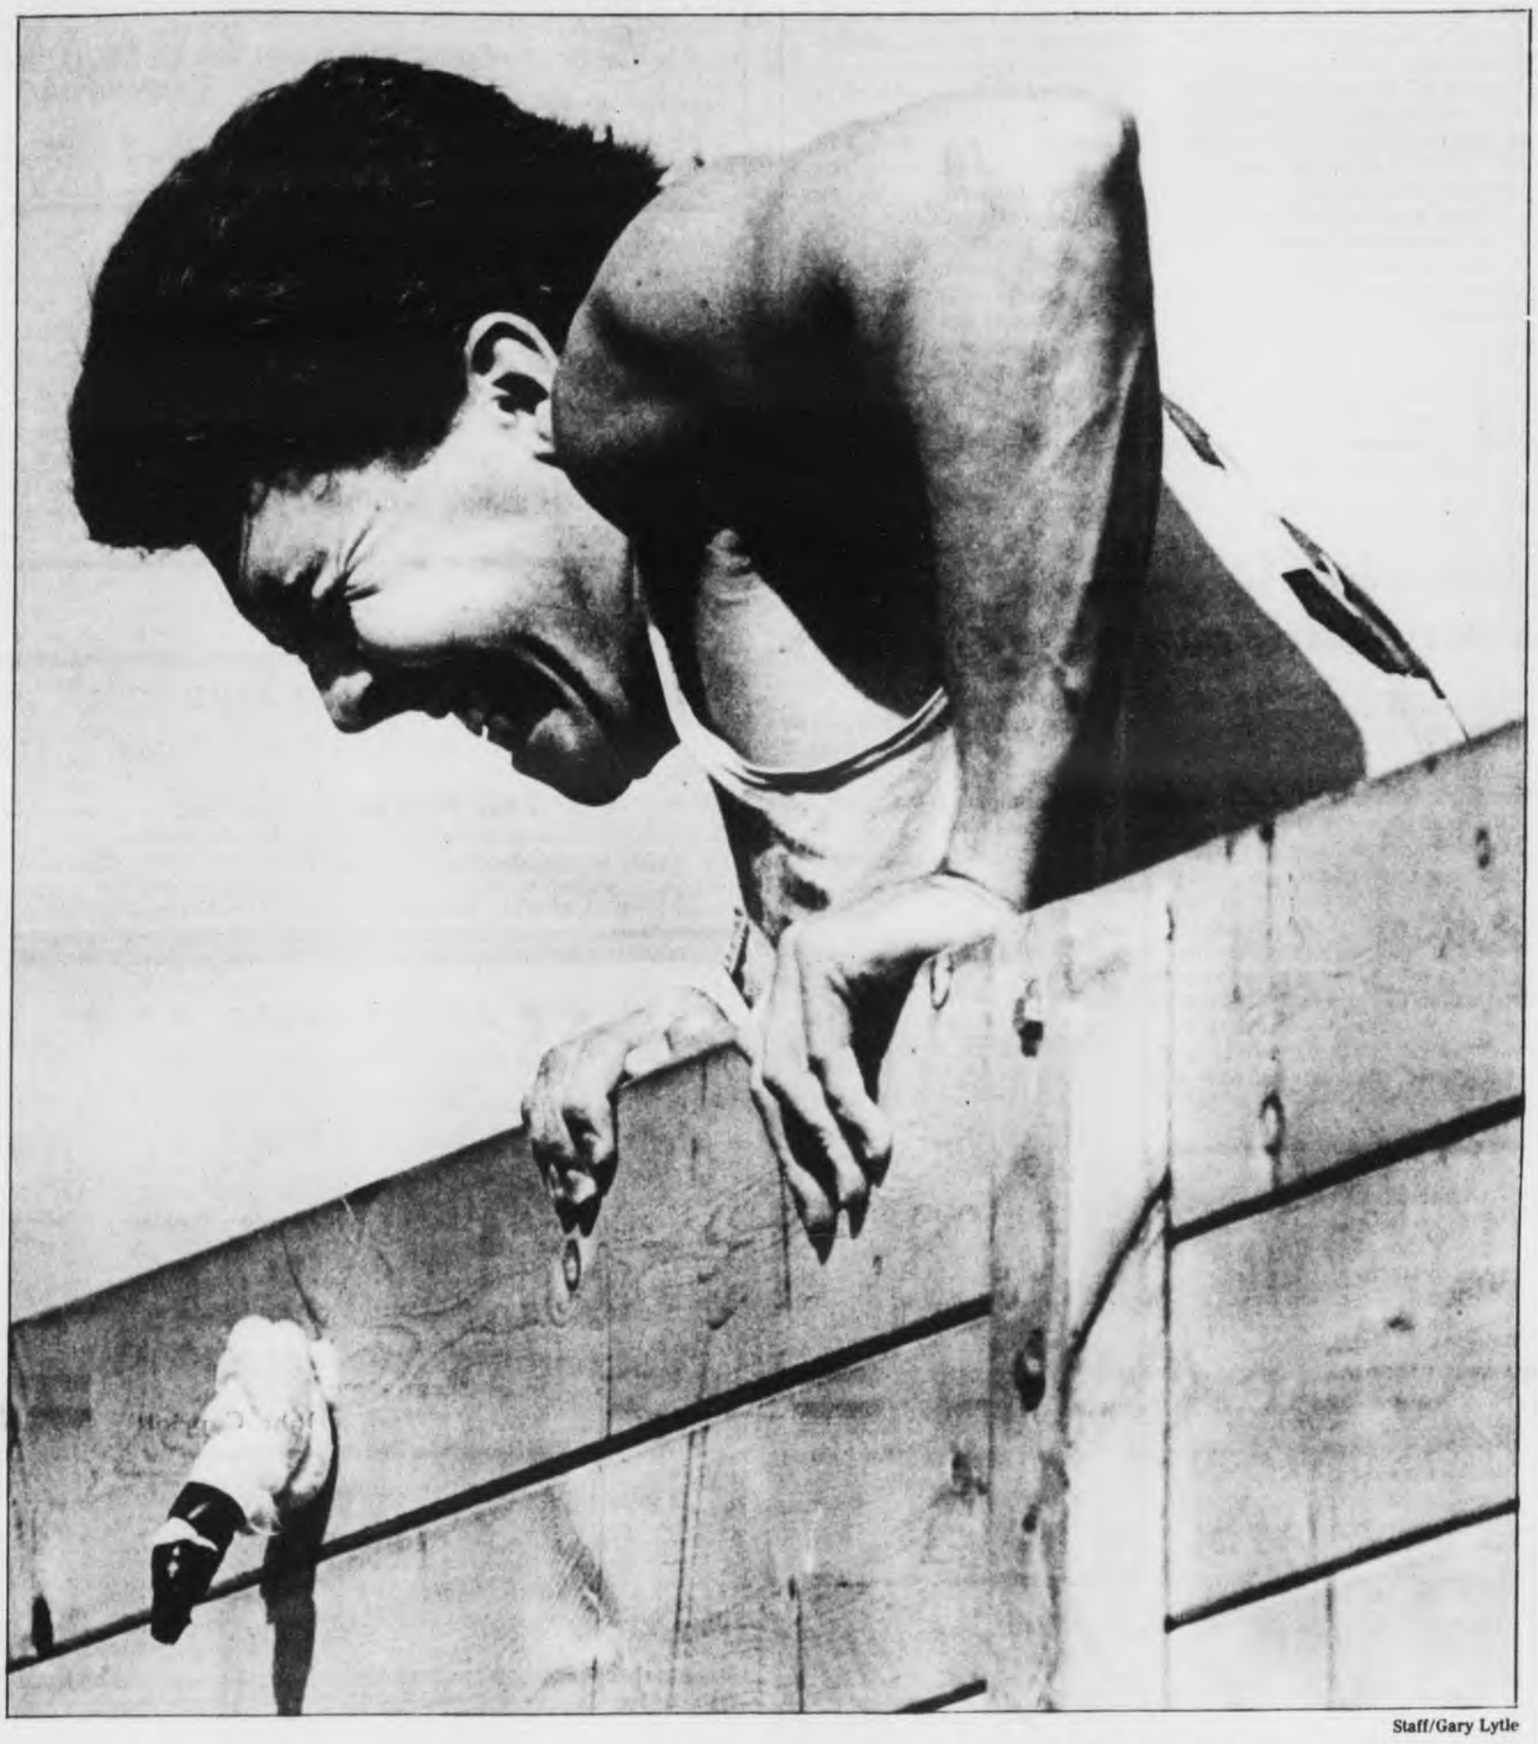
Theta Xi fraternity claimed championship honors for the second consecutive year at the Third Annual Ironman competition last weekend.

The Ironman competition, sponsored by the K-State Campus Crusade for Christ, is hosted solely for the benefit of the fraternity system, said director Dave Dishman.

"Ironman is put on to basically help strengthen the fraternity system," Dishman said. "The competition is friendly, and the athletes have a good time."

Eight fraternities each chose seven athletes to participate in the competition, which is divided into seven separate athletic events. Each area required teamwork and athletic ability.

Events on Friday included swimming and a "manmaker" relay. "Manmaker" required team members to run 40 yards, hop 40 yards and to carry another team member on their backs the final 40 yards.



Saturday's events included a six-mile running relay, a six-mile bicycling relay and a basketball tournament.

Competiton ended Sunday when fraternity members participated in an obstacle course and a circuit relay at Memorial Stadium.

In the circuit relay, participants had 15 minutes to complete as many athletic circuits as possible. The circuits involved running a 440-yard dash, completing a round of calisthenics, and running another 440.

The idea for an Ironman competition was begun about five years ago by the Campus Crusade for Christ at Southwest Missouri State, Dishman said.

Second place in the Ironman contest was captured by the Beta Theta Pi fraternity, with the Sigma Chi fraternity coming in third.

Bill Blasing, senior in business management, makes it over the top of the obstacle course wall during the final event in the Ironman competition Sunday afternoon at Memorial Stadium. Blasing was a member of the Phi Kappa Theta team, one of eight teams participating in the weekend event.

K-State volleyball team loses conference match

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

K-State volleyball coach Scott Nelson said it's hard for him to judge how good Iowa State was Friday in Ames because his Wildcats were plagued with unforced errors in dropping the match.

"We'd give them undeserved momentum with unforced errors," Nelson said. "We made some service errors at inopportune times."

K-State dropped the first 13 points of the opening game against Iowa State and eventually lost 15-12. The Cyclones went on to win the Big Eight Conference opener for both teams by dumping the 'Cats 15-3 and 15-10 in the next two.

The 'Cats, 5-5 overall and 0-1 in conference play, bounced back Saturday with a five-game victory against Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa.

Nelson said that playing on the road is an added pressure for his young squad.

"I think one thing is obvious," he said. "It's going to be tough to win on the road in the Big Eight."

Nelson's squad did net its first road win of the year with the victory against Drake. The 'Cats were 0-4 in previous attempts this season on the road.

"It was nice to win our match (against Drake). Obviously, psychologically, it proves we can win on the road. That's a positive sign," Nelson said.

The match took almost two hours, but the 'Cats came out on top 14-16, 15-5, 15-13, 10-15 and 15-6. K-State had beaten the Bulldogs in a match at Manhattan earlier in the season.

"We still kind of struggled some with our unforced errors," Nelson said, but added, "I'm pleased that when it came down to time to win, we did."

Nelson said he was especially pleased with the play of senior Helen Bundy in the Drake match. Bundy recently rejoined the team after spending several weeks of the season sidelined with a knee injury.

Bundy, who plays the middle blocker position, led the team in blocking in the Drake match.

K-State will attempt to even its Big Eight record when it faces the University of Kansas in Lawrence Wednesday night.

Briefly In Sports

Crew team defends championship

K-State's Crew team defended its championship at The Head of the Des Moines River Regatta Saturday in Des Moines, Iowa.

The "A" crew, which defeated Notre Dame for the Des Moines title last year, outdistanced five other teams by covering the three-mile course in 20 minutes, 12 seconds. Second place went to K-State's "B" team, which clocked in at 20:31.

"During the last half of the course, which was pretty long by rowing standards, we were smoking (the opposition)," K-State Coach Don Rose said. "That indicates we're tough both mentally and physically."

Other teams competing were St. John's (21:26), the University of Chicago (24:11), Des Moines club (24:34), Nebraska (24:42) and Creighton (27:39).

In the women's novice race, Manhattan High School's team placed third out of five teams. K-State's mixed-eight team took fourth out of nine squads competing.

K-State's Crew team will conclude its season with the Class Day Races at Tuttle Creek Lake on Nov. 1.

Fijis claim softball championship

Fifteen fraternities competed in the Alpha Delta Pi softball tournament this weekend to benefit the Ronald McDonald houses with Phi Gamma Delta winning the tournament championship.

The Fijis defeated Delta Upsilon 14-11 in the second title game. After the Fijis lost to the DU's in the winner's bracket final, they had to defeat Kappa Sigma and the DU's twice to claim the championship.

The tournament — sponsored by the ADPi sorority, Brother's Tavern and the Topeka McDonalds — was held Saturday and Sunday at Cico Park. Approximately $900 was raised during the tourney, according to Pam Besler, service chairman for the ADPis.

Ronald McDonald houses "provide a place for parents to stay when their children are in the hospital for an extended period of time," said Wendy Wittmer, assistant director of the tournament.

Soccer teams suffer pair of defeats

K-State's women's soccer team lost its season and home opener 2-1 to the University of Kansas on Saturday, while the men's team lost its first game of the season Saturday 1-0 to Iowa State in Ames. K-State, 3-1, played at Northern Iowa Sunday.

In the women's game, Kansas scored first midway through the first half only to be matched shortly after by K-State's only goal, which was scored by Linda McPheron. The tie stood until the last minute of the match when KU scored the winning goal.

The K-State women meet Rockhurst College at Memorial Stadium Saturday. Game time is scheduled for 1 p.m.

Tennis team falls to OSU, OU

Oklahoma and Oklahoma State each shut out the K-State women's tennis team at the Oklahoma State Invitational in Stillwater last weekend.

Host OSU blanked K-State 9-0 Friday, and the Lady Sooners bested the Wildcats by the same score on Saturday. The 'Cats were playing without their No. 1 singles player, Lena Svensson, who has been bothered with a lower-back strain.

"We'll just have to put this one out of our minds for now and concentrate on our upcoming match," Coach Steve Bietau said. The next match for the K-State women is against the University of Kansas Oct. 8 at Lawrence.

'Cats take pair from Butler County

Behind the hitting of Tony Braddock and Mike Hammacher, K-State's baseball team swept 6-2 and 18-8 victories from Butler County Community College at Frank Myers Field Sunday.

Braddock cracked a two-run homer in the sixth inning to snap a 2-2 deadlock as the Wildcats went on to win the opener. K-State, 4-0, received insurance runs in the seventh and eighth innings on solo homers by Otto Kaifes and Scott Spangenberg.

Darryl Rowley relieved starter Paul Iseman in the fifth inning and chalked up his second win of the season. Marty Darnell worked the ninth inning to earn the save.

K-State wasted little time in the second game by scoring seven runs in the first inning on its way to the 18-8 win. Hammacher, with the bases loaded, hit his first of two triples, and Jeff Turtle singled in two runs for the 'Cats during their first-inning outburst.

The Wildcats added to their lead in the sixth inning when Guy Greco hit a solo homer. Russ Ringginberg clouted a three-run shot in the seventh.

Zach Henderson, the second of four K-State pitchers who saw action in the game, was credited with the win.

Royals hit three straight homers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Twice in the history of the Kansas City Royals have home runs been struck on three consecutive at-bats. And Frank White, known more for his gold glove at second base than his tape measure home runs, has been involved in both.

"You wouldn't expect that of me, would you?" White grinned Sunday after hitting his 2[illegible]ome run to help power the Royals to a 6-2 victory over the O[illegible] A's. "I guess the pitchers were just throwing the ball where I was swinging my bat."

Oakland starter Dave Stewart had no-hit the Royals until George Brett, White and Jamie Quirk launched consecutive home runs in a five-run fo[illegible]n inning.

Exiled Cowboy out to intercept Dallas

By The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Dallas Coach Tom Landry hopes the Cowboys won't pay a penalty Monday night for letting a player slip away and join the St. Louis Cardinals.

"We felt that we needed to make a change," Landry said of safety Dennis Thurman, whom they chose to release after eight NFL seasons. "When you lose a guy like Dennis, it hurts you. It hurts us in coordinating our people, and I think he'll do a super job for St. Louis."

The 30-year-old Thurman, whose 36 career pass thefts make him the leading active interceptor in the National Football Conference, agrees.

"I'm happy to be where I am. Sometimes you need a new start," the one-time Southern Cal star said. "I had gone as far as I could go. All I was going to be was a 'nickel' back the rest of my career."

With the Cards, whom he tormented as the ringleader of "Thurman's Thieves" in Dallas' defense, the ex-Cowboy has so far maintained a low profile.

"I've had to take a low-key approach because I came in late," he said. "I have to prove to these guys that I can play football and that I do belong."

Thurman is, of course, only o[illegible] several former Dallas t[illegible] members looking fo[illegible]d to Mon[illegible] night's reunion.

Gene Stalling[illegible]t his National Footbal[illegible] coaching teeth under Lar[illegible] 14 seasons, is St. Louis' new [illegible]ad coach. His assistants include offensive coordinator Jim Shofner, who served the Cowboys in the same capacity, and defensive backs coach Mel Renfro.

Renfro makes it clear, however, that the Cards are not being molded under Stallings as clones of Landry's perennially strong units.

"Dallas was a finesse team," said Renfro, a former NFL all-pro defensive back for the Cowboys. "That's not Gene's style. He wants to push the opponent off the ball, to beat your man one-on-one."

So far, the scheme has not produced the desired results for St. Louis, 0-3. But there are unmistakable signs of a turn-around.

The Cards, who a year ago ranked near the bottom in the NFL on defense, this year stand fifth. Their pass defense is first, although they rank 25th against the run — a Dallas forte.

Stallings cites a multitude of early-season injuries and the team's penchant for picking up costly penalties as particularly devastating.

"I think they're playing with a lot of determination, but we're playing sort of shorthanded," the coach said. "They're doing the right things, but they're not getting in the win column."

A year ago, St. Louis rallied in the second half of a Monday night contest for a 21-10 upset of the Cowboys — one of two Cardinal victories in their last 15 games.

"Basically, we're on the right track except for one thing — the final outcome," Cards linebacker E. J. Junior said. "If we can get out there and play with the intensity we have the first three games...there shouldn't be any reason why we shouldn't beat Dallas."

Landry said he expects St. Louis to emerge from its doldrums under Stallings, who was his coaching protege until last February.

"Injuries and stuff are hurting him. When that hits you and you lose players, there isn't a heck of a lot you can do," the Dallas coach said. "Once he gets it straightened out, I have no question about his ability."

Manhattan Chamber challenges Lawrence

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce has adopted a "Beat Lawrence" theme and is challenging the Lawrence Chamber of Commerce to a membership sales competition beginning Oct. 17.

Wendy Schiappa, director of public affairs for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the two organizations will be competing to see which can sell the most new memberships to businesses. Kickoff for the drive will coincide with the University of Kansas-K-State football game Oct. 18 in KSU Stadium and continue for three weeks.

The Manhattan chamber decided to compete with another city in a sales drive as a new way to challenge the volunteers who sell the memberships to businesses, Schiappa said. Lawrence was asked because of the natural rivalry between the two cities.

The kickoff for the drive will include a meeting for all sales volunteers from both cities on Oct. 17 in Topeka and a tailgate party at the football game the next day. This will give the volunteers a chance to make some individual bets and challenges, Schiappa said.

The Manhattan chamber has purchased a billboard in downtown Lawrence to announce the competition. It will read, "Beat Lawrence, a challenge from the chamber up the river," Schiappa said. The theme will be used throughout the drive in other advertising and promotion.

The sales goal for Manhattan is 130 new memberships, he said. Currently, there are 720 businesses in the chamber. The sales drive ends Nov. 6 with a celebration party and the awarding of a trip for two to Lake Tahoe, Nev., for the volunteer with the highest individual sales.

The purpose of the Chamber of Commerce is to promote a healthy local economy, Schiappa said. The businesses are involved with the chamber to "make an investment back in the community."

Wefald meets with black faculty, staff

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

Plans for recruiting more black faculty and staff to the University were discussed Friday when University President Jon Wefald met with the Black Faculty Staff Alliance in the Union Sunflower Room.

"The alliance is an organization consisting of more than 30 black faculty and staff members who are concerned with the issues and decisions that affect the black faculty and staff at K-State," said Art Sykes, director of general services of the University Physical Facilities and acting chairman of the alliance.

At the breakfast, Wefald said he encouraged the search for more qualified individuals to attain faculty and staff positions at the University. He said he realized there has not been a good job done in the past in recruiting minority instructors to K-State, but now he feels changes will be made to resolve this problem.

The administration is in the process of recruiting minority students in targeted areas in Kansas that are high in minority percentages, he said. These areas include Wyandotte County, Wichita, Topeka and Kansas City.

The alliance was founded in May by 20 black faculty members who were concerned with promoting racial equality at K-State, Sykes said. The group wants to educate the University and community about racism and discrimination, and aid in retaining and recruiting more black faculty and staff.

"This is the beginning in what we see as recruitment formation," Sykes said.

The committee that primarily organized the alliance included Anne Butler, assistant director for minority affairs; Charles Rankin, director of the Midwest Race Desegregation Assistance Center in the College of Education; Philip Royster, coordinator of ethnic studies and professor of English; Reggie McGowan, program counselor of Upward Bound and assistant of minority affairs; Juanita McGowan, program planner with the desegregation assistance center; and Sykes.

Dole says tax bill to change if economy suffers too much

By The Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Congress will closely watch the new tax code's effect on business and will move swiftly to change it if the economy suffers, Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole said Sunday.

"We went a little too far on the business side," the Kansas Republican said a day after the Senate, on a 74-23 vote, sent President Reagan the biggest post-World War II changes to the nation's tax laws. "I think it's great to cut individual taxes, but unless you have a job there isn't much difference what your tax rate will be."

The measure shifts more than $120 billion in taxes from individuals to businesses over the next five years, about $30 billion more than the original Senate plan.

Bike Rodeo challenges cyclists' ability

Police emphasize knowledge, safety

By The Collegian Staff

Bicycle riders of all ages participated in the Bike Rodeo Saturday at Amanda Arnold Elementary School, 1435 Hudson Ave.

The main purpose of the rodeo, sponsored by the Riley County Police Department, was to check riders' knowledge of bicycle safety and bicycle rules and regulations.

The RCPD tested about 80 school kids, but Sgt. Buddy Mays, head of the RCPD special projects, said he was disappointed with the low turnout, blaming it partly on the school's distance from K-State.

"I really thought more college kids would show up," Mays said. "But I think the low participation could be due to the distance."

However, he said, the rodeo can be termed a success by helping just one child.

Members of the police reserves were available to help inspect the bikes, give the written tests and run the cyclists through the skills course.

A written test was given to see if the cyclists understood the rules and regulations. If a child was too young to read, a parent was allowed to read the test to the child.

Bike inspections were performed to inform the riders of safety problems on their bikes and to ensure the bikes could make it through the skill course.

Six courses were set up in the skill test to rate how each cyclist could handle the bike. The courses tested skills of balancing on a curve, pedaling and braking, signaling, balancing at a slow speed, maneuvering and the ability to change balance.

Jon Reed, 7, Manhattan, was one of the participants in the rodeo. His father, Richard, said he thought the rodeo was a worthwhile event. Reed said he was glad to see his son learn to control his bike and become more aware of proper hand signals.

"He seems to listen more to the police officers than to me. I've been telling him for weeks to quit braking by dragging his feet," Reed said after watching his son complete the braking test.

After the tests and inspections, police registered the bikes by recording vital information on a card for use in case the bike is stolen.

Legislators prepare for adjournment

Congress faces budget, S. African bills

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress faces another budget crisis this week as the legislators try to clear their crowded desks so they can adjourn for the year and return home to campaign for re-election.

One major hurdle was cleared over the weekend when the Senate followed the lead of the House and approved a far-reaching tax overhaul bill.

The congressional agenda is still crowded with a number of major issues, including whether to override President Reagan's veto of a bill imposing economic sanctions on South Africa, to raise the federal debt ceiling, to approve an anti-drug package, and whether the Senate should remove a federal judge from office.

But at the top of the list is the largest spending bill Congress has ever considered, a budget measure made necessary because none of the 13 regular bills appropriating money for federal agencies has been passed.

The House voted 201-200 passage Thursday of a $562 billion spending package and the Senate is scheduled Monday to begin considering its own $556 billion version of the same bill. Approval by the Republican-controlled Senate will send the package to a House-Senate conference committee to reconcile the hundreds of differences.

The current fiscal year ends Tuesday and legally, the government cannot spend any more after that unless Congress approves, and Reagan signs, the budget bill by then.

Reagan renewed his threat Saturday to veto the budget package unless Congress removes what he termed "simply unacceptable" restrictions on the Pentagon that were added by the Democrat-controlled House.

"This is no way to run a government," Reagan said in his weekly radio address, noting that the budget crisis has become a regular feature of congressional sessions shortly before adjournment.

Congress has set Friday as a target date for adjournment, but it was unclear whether lawmakers could finish their business by then.

The spending plan before the Senate would provide less spending for domestic programs and more for the military than the House version. But the chief targets of Reagan's ire are five restrictions on major national security programs programs — the SALT II nuclear arms treaty, chemical weapons, nuclear tests, anti-satellite weapons, and "Star Wars" anti-missile defense.

Another financial bill needing approval by each chamber would raise the federal government's debt ceiling from the current $2.11 trillion to $2.32 trillion. The government is nearing the current ceiling and is expected to hit the limit before Congress returns next year.

While Reagan is lobbying for a budget bill he likes, he is also trying to pick up enough votes to win a fight over his veto of a bill providing a wide range of economic sanctions against South Africa's white minority government.

The House approved the bill by a 300-77 vote and the Senate passed it 84-14; both margins are far beyond the two-thirds vote needed in each chamber to override Reagan's veto and enact the measure into law.

The veto vote in the Senate is expected Wednesday, the same day the full chamber will begin considering whether to remove U.S. District Judge Harry E. Claiborne from office.

The House has impeached Claiborne, who is convicted of tax evasion, and a 12-member panel of senators has heard seven days of testimony about the case. Claiborne is serving a two-year sentence for cheating on his 1979 and 1980 taxes.

Also undecided is the question of whether Congress will enact a package of anti-drug legislation. The House approved its version of a bill earlier this month.

While both the House and Senate have come up with their versions of anti-drug legislation, President Reagan has proposed an anti-drug package that includes mandatory testing of federal workers.

The Senate bill does not have that mandatory provision, but it does make clear that federal laws cannot be used to block drug testing.

Black Student Union plans stronger unity

By SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Reporter

The Black Student Union is preparing for this year's many events, including the Big Eight Black Student Government Conference in February.

BSU is a non-profit organization concerned with the issues and activities of black students, said BSU President Andrea Shelton, senior in human development and journalism and mass communications.

Each year, the BSU is allocated funds from the Student Governing Association to use on cultural activities.

"This year, the organization is planning ways to strengthen cohesiveness between black students and faculty/staff on campus," Shelton said. "This will be done by establishing a Presidents' Club."

The Presidents' Club will consist of the presidents of the black greek organizations on campus, she said. They will be concerned with the many issues regarding black students at K-State and possible ways to resolve some of the problems.

This committee also will strive to build a "network system" between black students and other minority organizations on campus. The club is planning to establish a tighter relationship with the parents of the black students, Shelton said.

Involvement in the decision-making processes of student affairs and leadership formation are other goals of the BSU council this year.

"Black students need to become a part of the political structure at K-State and to begin voicing opinions on civic issues," said Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for minority affairs.

"Black students should get more involved in the mainstream of campus activities," Switzer said. "Getting involved in these activities will increase growth development and reach potentials of the black student."

Shelton said the BSU council also is preparing for the Big Eight Black Student Government Conference in February at the University of Oklahoma.

The council will attend workshops where they will discuss apathy, discrimination, black retention rates on Big Eight campuses and greek affairs, she said. These discussions will be led by prominent black professionals.

At the conference, the BSU council will have the opportunity to find solutions to the concerns of black students who attend Big Eight universities.

The conference will come to a close with a gospel extravaganza, beauty pageant and a black greek step show.

To raise funds for transportation and lodging expenses, the BSU council is preparing for its first "Parents' Weekend" on Nov. 7 and 8. The theme is "We're Stepping Out."

Parents can attend a talent show given by the students on Nov. 7. There also will be a chili feed on Nov. 8. The evening will close with a dance in the Union Catskeller from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m.

"Reaching the black students on campus is our main goal," Shelton said. "We need everyone to work together as one, because BSU is working for them."

'Powerful' portrayals heighten production

By LAURIE FAIRBURN
Entertainment Editor

Thelma Cates is reading aloud from the National Enquirer as the audience enters the Cates' home and becomes seated.

"Listen to this, Jessie, 'Cockroaches found to carry the AIDS virus.'" She lowers her chin and looks at Jessie above the rims of her reading glasses. "Better put some RAID on your list," she advises, and lets out a deep, husky giggle.

Play Review

Jessie has been preparing her list for days: What day to put the trash out. When the grocer will deliver. Where the extra fuses are. Who to call if the washing machine breaks down. What to order from the milkman.

Jessie won't be around to take care of Mama after tonight. She's planning to kill herself.

"'night, Mother," the K-State Players season opener, is a powerful final exchange between a mother and daughter. It is not an entertaining play. It is a necessary, valuable lesson. It is an uncomfortable story, because no matter what is said between Jessie and Mama, neither feels any more understood. They just feel powerless.

It is this feeling of powerlessness that has brought Jessie to the conclusion that the only thing she has any control over is her own life. Her decision to commit suicide is her last hope of having something come out the way she planned.

Mama is horrified by Jessie's plan and panicked by the thought of being without her. Though she tries, Mama is unsuccessful in her attempt to make Jessie realize her life is worth something. Jessie contradicts everything with a reasoning that has us believe she is right — she hasn't done much to be proud of.

Even sadder moments arise when Jessie and Mama try to share memories — the taste of Mama's hot cocoa, Jessie's father — because so often the happiness was not shared. It was often contrived from lies to begin with.

As Mama and Jessie try to understand one another, the frustration explodes and subsides often, making the play emotionally exhausting for the audience as well as the players.

Pat Foltz, graduate in education, as Mama, is the strength of the show, bringing to her character unbridled fear, anguish and desperation, along with a very odd sense of humor. Her very soul is aching with the realization she is powerless over her daughter's life. She struggles to regain her composure as she realizes all the harm she has done to Jessie over the years, all the time only trying to protect her.

Penny Cullers, senior in theater, is outstanding in her portrayal of Jessie, a woman who has lost at everything and accepted it. If it were not for this realization, the audience might not believe this frail woman with the quivering voice and darting eyes has the strength to kill herself.

But in her effort to make Mama understand, she lets out an almost vicious anger that keeps Mama at a distance. She draws a line and dares Mama to cross it, and Mama knows if she does the end will come sooner — and it will be her doing.

This keeps the story played out to its depressing, hopeless end. And as Mama stands on the outside of a locked door, Jessie knows this is the one thing in her life that will turn out just the way she planned.

Before the moratorium, all Soviet tests on the site were carried out in shafts bored horizontally into the granite, said Gen. Arkady D. Ilyenko, commander of the test zone area.

A new tunnel was built for each test, with the length depending on the strength of the blast, Ilyenko said.

He said that the Soviet Union has strictly observed the 1974 threshold treaty with the United States, which limits the two powers to underground explosions of no more than 150 kilotons.

The United States has declined to join the test ban, with government officials citing as one reason the need for contined testing to maintain the efficiency of existing weaponry.

Ilyenko said he could not accept U.S. arguments that no fully reliable means yet existed for monitoring nuclear blasts.

Since July, two American scientific observers and a team from the Soviet Academy of Sciences have been operating three monitoring stations near Semipalatinsk.

Under the private agreement between U.S. and Soviet scientists, Soviet monitoring stations also are to be established around the Nevada testing grounds. But so far, the Soviet scientists have not received their U.S. visas, Foreign Ministry officials told the journalists here.

At the monitoring station set up by American scientists, seismologist David Chavez told the group, "There has been absolutely no sign of activity on the Soviet site since we've been here."

effectively voted for it, and only 14 senators supported expanded use of the military.

The Democratic-controlled House approved the imposition of the death penalty for persons convicted of large-scale drug sales. A similar amendment to the Senate version was offered by Sen. Mack Mattingly, R-Ga., who called it a good way to deal with "murderous drug kingpins."

An attempt to kill Mattlingly's amendment was voted down, 60-25, but he withdrew after winning that key test. Mattingly said opponents of his measure would filibuster final Senate action on the bill, which would block its chances for the year.

The military amendent was rejected 72-14 after opponents argued that it would violate individuals' civil rights and would detract from the military's chief mission of defending the nation against armed enemy attack.

The Senate did vote 83-4 approval of an amendment that would give the secretary of defense three months to send Congress a list of what actions the U.S. military can take to aid anti-drug efforts by civilian agencies.

Both bills would increase spending for drug interdiction and eradication, education, treatment and local law enforcement. They would also increase penalties for drug possession and sales, outlaw "designer drugs," and tighten provisions used to fight money-laundering by drug dealers.

Tuition

"Clearly, this is something the Board (of Regents) has the power to do," Rawson said. "But I don't believe any increase in tuition is being considered in a formal fashion."

The state now appropriates $83 to $84 million in funds to K-State. Students pay 25 percent of that, which comes to about $19 million, Hipsher said.

She also said an 8-percent increase would mean students would pay 33 percent of the appropriations, while there would be no increase in state appropriations.

The ASK release reported a tuition increase may be more politically popular than an increase in taxes. The release also said tuition has doubled since 1980.

the help of countries like the United States to make its future great, Nie said.

The student's associate adviser, Robert Kruh, associate provost/professor and dean of graduate school, also spoke at the ceremony. Kruh said this was a beginning of a new era of opportunity for both countries. K-State is part of a pattern to move China vigorously forward with a new economy.

Kruh toured China two years ago and saw first-hand the advances China was making through their educational institutions. Kruh said the University is pleased to be a part of this along with a growing number of Chinese students and lasting friendships at K-State.

Soviets allow Daniloff's departure

Staff/Jim Dietz

President Reagan prepares to speak after U.S. Senate candidate Christopher Bond, R-Mo., introduces him Monday afternoon. Reagan was at the Downtown Airport in Kansas City, Mo., while on a Midwest campaigning tour for Republican candidates.

Official predicts trade, Daniloff for Zakharov

By The Associated Press

FRANKFURT, West Germany — American reporter Nicholas Daniloff was freed by the Soviet Union Monday and flew to West Germany, signaling the apparent end of a month-long diplomatic showdown that threatened to wreck superpower relations.

In New York, an informed source at the United Nations said accused Soviet spy Gennadiy Zakharov also would be freed as part of an exchange.

There was no confirmation of that report. Earlier Monday, the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn, N.Y., where Zakharov was indicted, said there was no change in his status.

President Reagan, visiting Kansas City, Mo., said only, "We didn't give in." He said details of the arrangement would be disclosed Tuesday.

The 51-year-old Daniloff, Moscow correspondent for U.S. News & World Report for five years, told reporters at Moscow's airport he was leaving "more in sorrow than in anger." He and his wife then boarded a Lufthansa flight that landed in Frankfurt at 8:55 p.m. Monday (3:55 p.m. EDT).

The release of Daniloff, who had been accused by the Soviets of spying, came after long hours of negotiations in Washington and New York between U.S. Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze.

New York sources had said the superpower deal might also include the release of some Soviet dissidents. The Soviets, meanwhile, have sought a relaxation of a U.S. order expelling 25 Soviet diplomats from the United States.

Daniloff had been living in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow since Sept. 12, when he was released into the U.S. Embassy's custody after 13 days in Lefortovo Prison.

At the same time, U.S. officials released Soviet U.N. employee Zakharov, 39, who was arrested Aug. 23, into the custody of Soviet Ambassador Yuri Dubinin.

"I was informed sometime this afternoon that I would be allowed to leave," Daniloff said at the airport. "My passport was returned by the Foreign Ministry with my multiple-entry visa and my press card, which is still valid.

"I want to say that I don't know the terms of the arrangement," Daniloff said. "As far as I know, I am leaving independently."

Although the White House had consistently ruled out a swap of Daniloff for Zakharov, U.S. and Soviet officials had discussed the case intensively for weeks.

The Soviet Union denied Daniloff was arrested to give the Kremlin bargaining leverage in the Zakharov case and insisted the American journalist was guilty of espionage.

He was charged with spying in a three-count indictment that roughly paralleled the charges filed against Zakharov.

Reagan campaigns for Senate hopeful

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

KANSAS CITY, MO. — President Ronald Reagan announced Monday during a campaign visit to Kansas City the release of American journalist Nicholas Daniloff.

However, Reagan said nothing about the arrangements freeing the U.S. News & World Report magazine reporter a month and one day after he had been seized by the KGB and charged with spying.

"I have something of a news announcement I would like to make," Reagan said at the Republican pep rally he attended at the Kansas City Downtown Airport.

"In case you haven't already heard, at 12 o'clock Central Time, a Lufthansa Airliner left Moscow traveling for Frankfurt, West Germany, and on board are Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Daniloff," Reagan said.

Reagan refused to add anything else except, "We didn't give in."

Reagan was in Kansas City campaigning for Republican candidate for Senate, Christopher Bond, a former two-term governor fighting Democratic Lt. Gov. Harriett Woods for the seat being vacated by Democratic Sen. Thomas Eagleton.

Reagan is working to maintain the 53-47 Republican edge in the Senate.

"I didn't seek to be a six-year president," Reagan said.

"There is too much to be completed. I will not have my hands tied by a Senate totally hostile to what we want to do."

After leaving Kansas City, Reagan traveled to Sioux Falls, S.D., to lend his support in another crucial Senate race between Sen. James Abdnor, a first-term Republican senator challenged by Democratic Rep. Tom Daschle.

Reagan journeyed to Kansas City with the hope of brightening Bond's campaign. Although dismal rain greeted his arrival at the airport causing the planned pep rally to be moved inside, the weather had no obvious effect on the participants as they cheered the President's arrival and waved American flags and signs bearing messages of "Reagan-Bond, Missouri's Team."

Tony Byers and Jim Dolinar keep dry under an umbrella while waiting in line Monday to gain entrance to see President Reagan. The boys are students from St. John the Baptist Elementary School in Kansas City.

Reagan appealed to Democratic voters stating the recent liberal leadership of the Democratic party, doesn't represent "the hard-working Democrats...that can be found around the country."

Reagan said the current Democratic leadership is not willing to prevent the Soviets from establishing a grip on Central America.

"Imagine if that great Missourian Harry Truman were here, what he'd think.

"This was the man who battled Communist aggression in Korea and whose timely aid saved Greece and possibly much of Europe from Communist enslavement.

"What would he say about a party who sees the Soviets building another fortress Cuba on the American mainland and won't even lift a finger to stop it?"

Reagan said he knows it is hard for the Democrats to break tradition, but quoted Winston Churchill as saying, "Some men change their principles for their party and some men change their party for their principles."

Professors analyze probable intentions for freeing reporter

By PAT HUND
Staff Writer

The Soviet Union probably released American journalist Nicholas Daniloff as part of a prearranged trade for the release of accused Soviet spy Gennadiy Zakharov, said Jerry Rosenberg, assistant professor of political science.

"I don't think that it's an unconditional release because the Soviets made too much of the Daniloff case," Rosenberg said. "Now they (the Soviet Union) have to show that they are getting something in return."

Daniloff, who was held on charges of being a CIA agent, was allowed to leave the Soviet Union on Monday after being arrested by Soviet authorities on Aug. 30.

From the Soviet perspective, Rosenberg compared the release of Daniloff to a chess move.

"The Russians considered Daniloff a pawn, and now they want to trade one pawn for another pawn (Zakharov)," he said.

"I think it is a question of who got the better deal," he said. "If it (were to be) a one-on-one trade, I think the Soviets got the better deal."

Rosenberg said he thinks, however, that a third person may be included in the trade.

"The Soviet Union might free another dissident to make the trade even because the Soviet Union didn't have to give up anything to get Zakharov," he said. "Of course, they would not admit publicly that the third person is part of the deal," he said.

Rosenberg said one possibility for the Soviet Union might be to send a Jewish dissident to Israel so that it would not appear to be part of the Daniloff deal.

Rosenberg and William Richter, head of the Department of Political Science, agreed that while the Soviet Union equates the two espionage

House reverses Reagan's veto; Senate seeks more funding

Dole says finding sustaining votes 'difficult'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, rebuffed by the House over his South African policies, now must battle heavy odds to convince the Senate to sustain his veto of punitive economic sanctions against Pretoria's white minority government.

Reagan's last-minute offer Monday to impose new but limited sanctions by executive order did not sway votes in the House, which voted 313-83 to override the Reagan veto. The tally was only marginally different from the 308-77 vote by which the House passed the sanctions bill on Sept. 12.

Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole said it will be "very difficult" for Reagan to prevail in the Senate, which approved sanctions, 84-14, on Aug. 15.

The Senate is expected to vote on whether to sustain or override the veto on Wednesday. It takes a two-thirds vote of members present to override a veto.

Regan picked up only six votes from the last House roll call on sanctions. A total of 81 Democrats and 79 Republicans voted to sustain it.

In his letter to House and Senate leaders, Reagan urged Congress to unite with him in a common stand against South Africa's apartheid system of racial separation and discrimination.

Reagan said he would impose by executive order a ban on new U.S. investments to all South African companies except those owned by blacks, ban the import of South African companies except those owned by blacks, ban the import of South African iron and steel, ban U.S. bank accounts for the South African government on its agencies, review ways to reduce U.S. dependence on stratgegic minerals from South Africa and provide $25 million in U.S. aid to disadvantaged

Senate debate continues over spending bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate opened debate on a $556 billion catchall spending bill Monday, but quick passage appeared unlikely and lawmakers were looking at stopgap legislation to keep the government going when fiscal 1987 begins Wednesday.

Sen. Mark O. Hatfield, chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, said he hoped "the single largest appropriations measure this body has ever considered," would clear the Senate late Tuesday or early Wednesday without major changes.

Hatfield's committee had stripped out many of the House-passed provisions that sparked threats of a veto by President Reagan. But keeping the bill free from add-ons in the Senate would be a challenge.

In the first test, the Senate refused to approve $200 million in special aid for the Philippines. By a 51-43 vote, it rejected an amendment by Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd, that would have taken that money from assistance to other nations except Israel and Egypt.

But there were 120 other amendments pending, including one by Hatfield on a nuclear arms freeze.

President Reagan has cited arms control limitations as the leading reasons he would veto a House-approved $562 billion spending bill.

The House approved a freeze on spending for Reagan's "Star Wars" missile defense system, continuation of a ban on anti-satellite weapons tests, a prohibition of U.S. nuclear weapons tests so long as the Soviets observe their own test ban, a ban on chemical weapons and a requirement that the administration comply with the SALT II treaty.

Even if the Senate completes its work before Wednesday, striking a final compromise with the House that also was acceptable to the ad-

Gunmen seize Frenchman in Beirut

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A French free-lance cameraman is missing and presumed kidnapped in Moslem west Beirut, French embassy spokesman Francois Abi Saab said Monday.

The victim was identified as Jean-Marc Sroussi, 41, who has been living in the Lebanese capital since 1982.

Abi Saab said Sroussi was last seen by acquaintances driving across Beirut's dividing Green Line from the Christian to the Moslem sector Sunday.

He said Sroussi's disappearance was reported to the embassy by his Lebanese fiancee Mona Habshi.

A witness, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said he saw Moslem gunmen at the Green Line's Mreijeh crossing climb into Sroussi's car and race away.

American charged with war crimes

JERUSALEM — Prosecutors formally charged retired U.S. autoworker John Demjanjuk on Monday with torturing prisoners at a Nazi death camp and operating gas chambers in which hundreds of thousands were killed.

The 26-page indictment accused him of "crimes of incomparable severity," including stabbing prisoners and tearing off pieces of their flesh, while serving as a guard at the Treblinka camp in German-occupied Poland during World War II. Conviction could bring the death penalty.

Demjanjuk, 66, was born in the Soviet Ukraine and worked at a plant in Cleveland. He was extradited from the United States in February, accused of being the sadistic guard Jewish prisoners called Ivan the Terrible.

U.S. authorities stripped him of citizenship in 1981 after he was found guilty of lying about his Nazi past when he came to America in February 1952.

Docking expands education plans

OVERLAND PARK — Parents can help improve the Kansas educational system by becoming more involved in the training of their children, Lt. Gov. Tom Docking said Monday.

Docking, Democratic nominee for governor in the Nov. 4 election, unveiled another portion of his education platform, which he called Kan-HELP.

He said the letters stand for Kansas Home Extension of Learning Program.

"We've faced challenges like inadequate learning, discipline problems, drug and alcohol abuse and dropouts for many years. We have never brought all our forces to bear. It's time to make parents full partners in our system."

Housing for elderly receives funds

WASHINGTON — Low-interest federal loans totaling $3.4 million were awarded Monday to help finance housing projects for the elderly and disabled in five Kansas communities.

The monies from the Department of Housing and Urban Development were announced by Sen. Bob Dole.

The loans were:

—$1.13 million to Volunteers for America for 35 housing units in McPherson for the elderly.

—$1.13 million to National Church Residences for 35 housing units in Manhattan for the elderly.

—$581,700 for Community Living Opportunities for 18 housing units in Overland Park for the developmentally disabled.

—$290,800 for Handicapped Education and Living for nine housing units in Leavenworth for the developmentally disabled.

—$258,500 for Community Living for eight housing units in Wichita for the mentally ill.

Plane crashes into Chicago homes

CHICAGO — A pilot who radioed that his small plane had lost an engine crashed about a half-mile from Midway Airport, plowing into three homes and setting one of them ablaze, officials said.

The pilot died in the crash late Sunday in the South Side neighborhood, but no one on the ground was hurt, said Fire Department spokesman Tom Sheppard.

"I heard two big explosions," said Catherine Zadlo, who lives several houses down the block from the homes struck by the plane. "I thought it was a bomb going off, or thunder."

Federal Aviation Administration spokesman Mort Edelstein said the pilot of the twin-engine Beechcraft took off from Midway at about 11 p.m. and radioed moments later that he was returning because he had lost an engine.

The pilot was tentatively identified as Frank Jaax, about 50, of DuPage County, said Frank Schwarz, an investigator for the Cook County Medical Examiner's office.

Doctors to protest weapons test

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — A major nuclear weapons test has been scheduled for today, just hours before some 200 doctors plan to gather in the Nevada desert to protest continued U.S. nuclear testing.

The explosion, dubbed Lab Quark, will have a yield of up to 150,000 tons of TNT, the largest test allowed under the Limited Test Ban Treaty.

Barring bad weather, the test will be held at 8 a.m., some seven hours before the protest is planned at the gates to the sprawling Nevada Test Site 65 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

The test is the 10th announced test this year and the 16th announced since the Soviet Union began a unilateral test moratorium Aug. 6, 1985.

Judge postpones Walker sentencing

WASHINGTON — A federal judge Monday in Baltimore ordered a one-month delay in the sentencing of admitted spy John Walker Jr., whose truthfulness concerning the extent of the family's espionage ring is in doubt.

U.S. District Judge Alexander Harvey moved back the sentencing date from this coming Friday to Nov. 6 and specified that "no further continuance will be granted," according to a statement by the office of Breckinridge Willcox, the U.S. attorney for Maryland.

The U.S. attorney's statement said that the request for the delay came from the Navy, "to allow the Navy's damage assessment team additional time to attempt to ascertain the facts concerning the commencement and extent of the espionage conspiracy." The sentencing of Walker's son, Michael, also was delayed until Nov. 6.

Attorney General Edwin Meese said last week that the Justice Department is trying to determine the accuracy of Walker's statements to prosecutors.

Task force believes MIAs still held

WASHINGTON — A task force headed by a retired director of the Defense Intelligence Agency has concluded there is a strong possibility that American servicemen are still being held as prisoners in Southeast Asia, administration sources said Monday.

The report by the task force, headed by retired Lt. Gen. Eugene F. Tighe Jr. of the Air Force, does not contain any new, hard evidence that would establish "beyond all doubt" that prisoners from the Vietnam War are still being held against their will, the sources said.

Moreover, the report also concludes there is nothing to substantiate charges that the Reagan administration has purposely covered up evidence showing there are still live prisoners, added the officials.

Nonetheless, the task force concluded the preponderance of the available intelligence information is sufficient to support a conclusion that there are American servicemen who are still alive and being held against their will, the sources said.

Regents seek funding for building program

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents Monday unveiled new construction requests totaling $2.8 million during the next fiscal year as part of a $122.5 million building program at state university campuses.

Warren Corman, director of facilities for the regents, acknowledged as he presented the new requests to the Joint Committee on State Building Construction that funding for most of the new projects would have to come from general tax revenue.

Corman said the Kansas Legislature already has approved spending $61.4 million for construction at the six state universities and Kansas Technical Institute during the next three budget years. But Corman said those projects will consume nearly all of the annual property tax money which is set aside for regents construction purposes.

Although revenue shortfalls have placed a strain on the pool of general tax money called the State General Fund, Corman said the regents are requesting $4 million from that source for building maintenance and repairs in addition to the $2.8 million in new construction requests.

The money for repairs, maintenance, remodeling and energy conservation topped a list of 12 proposed building requests Corman outlined for the committee.

"Needless to say, the projects we have paired down and put on the fiscal year 1988 list are important or they wouldn't be there," Corman said. "We're laying it out there not as a wish list but as a real list."

A proposed $550,000 chilled water system for air conditioning in the Chemistry-Biochemistry Building at Kansas State University was ranked second among the new requests. That proposal calls for an expenditure of $100,000 during fiscal year 1988, which begins July 1, 1987.

A $202,000 survey of problems relating to major utility services at the University of Kansas was ranked third and a $150,000 expenditure toward a $12.7 million science building for Wichita State University was fourth on the list.

The list, which the regents approved last week, also calls for spending $200,000 next year toward a $1.6 million renovation of an aeronautical laboratory at KTI — and $187,000 toward $804,000 worth of work on Pittsburg State University's School of Technology.

Although the board asked for $4 million for maintaining the 600 university buildings across the state, Corman said depreciation on the campus buildings and grounds actually amounts to $24 million each year. He said the regents received $2.5 million for maintenance and repairs during the current fiscal year.

"If it were my house and I could only make 10 percent of the repairs that were necessary each year, after 15 years my house would be in the ghetto."

Daniloff release clears way for summit

Moscow relaxes meeting conditions

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The release of American reporter Nicholas Daniloff clears a bump on the road to a U.S.-Soviet summit, but the political fallout could be embarrassing for President Reagan.

The deal that is taking shape is bound to involve freedom for Gennadiy Zakharov, a Soviet physicist charged with spying in New York. And if Zakharov's case had been handled differently, Daniloff's arrest might have been avoidable in the first place.

Even though Reagan and other administration officials said over and over there would be no trade for the American reporter whose innocence they vouched for, a swap is turning out to be the solution to Daniloff's confinement.

In fact, the Soviets may have seized the U.S. News & World Report correspondent as the practical way to get Zakharov out of jail.

Apart from the political aspects, however, the outlook for a summit has brightened.

Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze has signaled a relaxation of Moscow's preconditions for a meeting between Reagan and General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev. He told reporters Sept. 20, after two days of agenda talks with Secretary of State George Shultz, that they had laid a foundation for a summit.

The basis for the new show of Soviet conciliation was a narrowing of differences in Geneva arms control talks over ways to reduce both long-range and medium-range nuclear missiles.

Reagan had instructed U.S. negotiator Max Kampelman only a few days earlier to ease the missile reductions initially demanded by the president. This improves the prospects of a deal that could be signed at a summit meeting.

But Daniloff's liberation removes only one of the four "bumps in the road" enumerated by Gennady Gerasimov, the Soviet foreign ministry spokesman, last week in New York.

The others are the case of Zakharov, the U.S. order expelling 25 Soviets from the U.N. mission and the unspecified retaliation threatened by Moscow if the order is not rescinded.

Shultz on Thursday flatly refused to backtrack on the expulsions. "Being host to the U.N. does not mean we should be host to intelligence activities by other nations," he said heatedly.

The administration has accused the 25 of espionage and called for 75 additional Soviets to leave over the next 18 months.

The U.S. proposal that freed Daniloff provides for Zakharov's release as well, but it may not come right away. A U.S. official here said he assumed the physicist would "have to go through some judicial proceeding."

A two-stage U.S. proposal was sent to Moscow through diplomatic channels shortly after Daniloff's arrest Aug. 30. It served as the basis for the lengthy negotiations Shultz and Shevardnadze held in New York.

The first stage called for Daniloff's release from Moscow. The second involves an understanding that Zakharov would be available for exchange after trial for a number of Soviet dissidents.

Much of the tedious bargaining between Shultz and Shevardnadze apparently centered on which dissidents would gain freedom.

The formula reaches back to 1978 when an American businessman, F. Jay Crawford, charged in Moscow with smuggling, was freed. The trial of two Soviet U.N. employes on espionage went ahead. They were convicted and received 30-year sentences. But they were exchanged after a year in jail for Alexander Ginsburg and four other Soviet dissidents.

The potential embarrassment for Reagan centers on how the Zakharov case was handled in the first place.

After FBI agents made the arrest he was sent to jail on the advice of the Justice Department. There was no consultation with the State Department.

KCC board reviews Union rate request

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Union Gas System Inc., based in Independence, Kan., asked the Kansas Corporation Commission Monday to reject adjustments recommended by KCC staff and grant all of a $2.35 million rate increase it is seeking.

"This is a very important rate case to Union," attorney Bob W. Storey told the commission as it opened three days of technical hearings on Union's request. "It's going to have a lot to do with how Union survives in the future."

The KCC staff has recommended allowing only 38 percent, or about $884,000, of Union's request.

Storey called as Union's first witness Harrison F. Johnson, the company's president since 1948.

Johnson's prepared testimony, which made the same basic arguments as Storey used in his opening statement on the company's behalf, was admitted into evidence. A KCC staff lawyer then began cross examining Johnson.

Other company officials, staff witnesses and a representative of the intervening Farmland Industries will testify through Wednesday, when the hearing is expected to conclude. A commission ruling expected by late fall.

If Union Gas is granted its entire request, residential customers using 10,000 cubic feet of natural gas a month would see their monthly bills rise about $3.38, including a 70-cent increase the company is asking in its base customer charge. That charge, now $3.10, is assessed regardless of how much gas a customer uses.

Union Gas serves about 54,000 residential customers and another 4,000 industrial and business customers in eastern and southeastern Kansas, including the cities of Independence, Coffeyville, Burlington, Overland Park, Olathe, Lenexa and Bonner Springs.

Storey, a former state senator from Topeka, said in his opening remarks that the Corporation Commission approved a lower rate of return for Union in 1981 than the KCC staff had recommended, and the company has been playing catch-up ever since that time.

He also noted Union Gas made $2 million in capital improvements in 1985 alone, the test year for this rate increase request, and $5 million in improvements since its last rate case in 1983 and argued it should be allowed to recover those costs.

Storey said Union Gas faces "some major problems," including loss of revenue from industrial customers who have initiated conservation measures and turned to other energy sources in recent years.

K-State honor society receives national award

By ALLISON WEAVER
Collegian Reporter

For the second consecutive year, the K-State Chapter of the Golden Key National Honor Society was the recipient of the prestigious Key Chapter Award.

"The best of the best is what they called us," said Stephanie Case, president of the chapter and senior in finance.

The award is presented yearly to notable chapters that exceed in their accomplishments and demonstrate effective leadership at their universities. A total of nine awards were presented this year.

Case; Dan Costello, Golden Key vice president and senior in accounting; Annette Myers, corresponding secretary and senior in elementary education; and Willard Nelson, faculty adviser and dean of education, went to Golden Key Headquarters in Atlanta on Aug. 1 to accept the award, Case said.

The award is based on a point system in which points are given to chapters for their activities geared to promote academic achievement, serving the community and providing social interaction, she said.

The decision on who wins an award is decided by evaluations of the chapter's adviser and corresponding secretary, Case said. These evaluations state whether or not the chapter fulfilled its responsibilities and list the amount of points the chapter has accumulated.

Some of the activities in which the K-State chapter was involved this past year are the Big Brother/Big Sister program for freshmen, Homecoming, ushering at football games, providing the Campus Awareness Information Booth and hosting the regional chapter convention for the Colorado, Texas, Missouri and Kansas chapters, she said.

There are 125 current members in the K-State chapter, which was created five years ago, she said. Letters were recently sent to approximately 300 students inviting them to become members.

Students who are eligible to become a member of Golden Key are those with a grade point average of 3.4 or above with a junior or senior status. An application must be filled out, and a one-time fee of $45 is required for a lifetime membership.

Honorary members are faculty members who are chosen as outstanding in their field. There are 21 honorary members to date and five more will be initiated this year, Case said.

The K-State chapter will award two scholarships to two active members, a junior and a senior, based on academic honors and involvement in campus and Golden Key activities. A reception for scholarship recipients and new members, both student and honorary, will take place on Oct. 5.

K-State should name construction for Will

The name of Thomas E. Will has been too long forgotten.

In his two years as president, he transformed K-State from an agricultural college into a major university. He gave students the beginnings of the K-State Union. His dedication to students and education has a direct effect on the lives of students at the University now.

Will served as University president from 1897 to 1899. At that time he was forced out of office for his political beliefs. He was accused of turning K-State into a socialist institution by townspeople when he opened a dining hall and bookstore on campus. What would the current K-State students do without these "socialist" additions to campus?

Will made tremendous strides in the field of education. When he took office, there were only the agriculture and home economics curricula. He added engineering and general studies to the list, changing the original direction and purpose of K-State.

While politicians have tried to erase Will's name from Kansas history, the people in Florida have a different view. After Will left K-State, he worked for the American Forestry Association in Florida helping with projects in the Everglades. To remember his deeds, a stretch of Florida state highway was named in his honor in 1941.

Some graduate students in history at K-State have tried to correct this error of omitting Will's name from campus structures. They unofficially named the graduate assistant's office in Eisenhower Hall after Will in 1982. The dedication ceremony was met with considerable opposition from the administration, but was carried out nonetheless.

It is time we bring the name of Thomas Will out of the dust of history. A new biochemistry building is under construction. This would be a proper place to immortalize the name of one of our greatest University presidents. Students and administration must not let his name be forgotten.

State tuition increase would harm students

Whenever an increase in tuition is under discussion by the Kansas Board of Regents, protest against an increase proliferates. This protest against a tuition increase is inspired by students already slumping under financial weight.

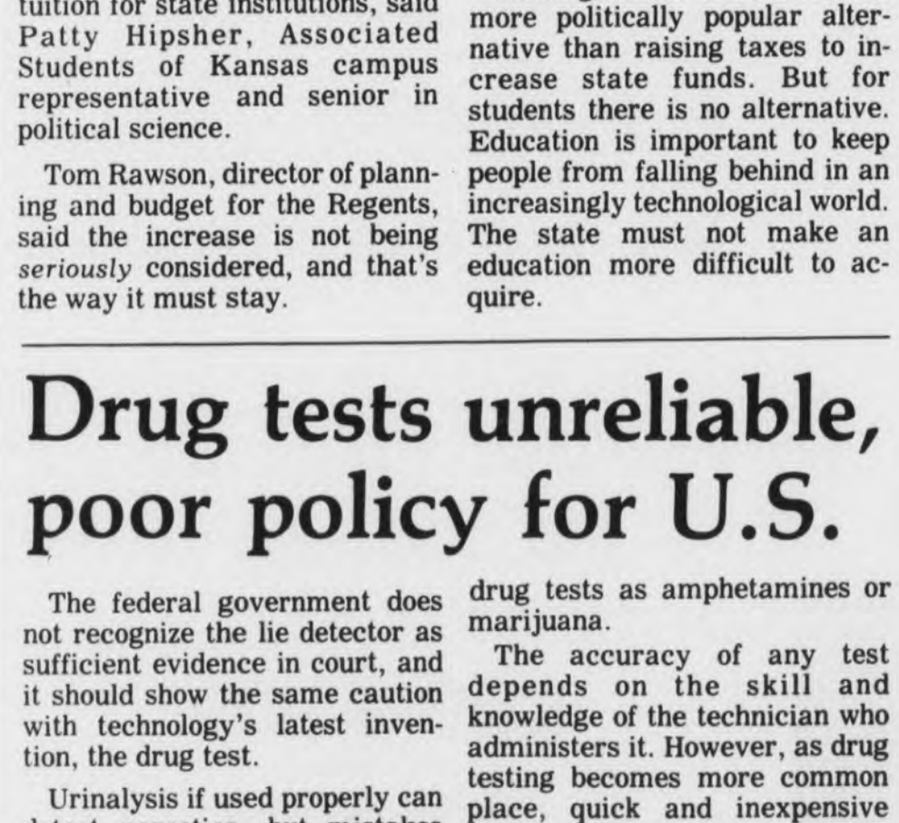
The Regents may consider a 5 percent to 8 percent increase in tuition for state institutions, said Patty Hipsher, Associated Students of Kansas campus representative and senior in political science.

Tom Rawson, director of planning and budget for the Regents, said the increase is not being seriously considered, and that's the way it must stay.

The increase depends upon the state's economic condition. State funding for the Regents' system comes from tax collections from personal and corporate incomes, sales and excises. When businesses sell less, taxes go down, and the fund subsequently decreases.

Raising tuition is said to be a more politically popular alternative than raising taxes to increase state funds. But for students there is no alternative. Education is important to keep people from falling behind in an increasingly technological world. The state must not make an education more difficult to acquire.

Drug tests unreliable, poor policy for U.S.



The federal government does not recognize the lie detector as sufficient evidence in court, and it should show the same caution with technology's latest invention, the drug test.

Urinalysis if used properly can detect narcotics, but mistakes are too easily made when an individual's career and reputation are at stake.

An ingredient in many over-the-counter pain relievers has been incorrectly identified in drug tests as amphetamines or marijuana.

The accuracy of any test depends on the skill and knowledge of the technician who administers it. However, as drug testing becomes more common place, quick and inexpensive testing will become a higher priority than professional competence.

Because results are unreliable, drug tests should not become a standard for testing the worth of an employee.

2nd stone age starts with ceramics

PHIL NORDHUS
Collegian Columnist

The 20th century will long be remembered for advances in high technology. The birth of the computer age and space age let us accomplish such feats as putting men on the moon. Now, as ironic as it may seem, the world is about to enter the stone age.

The emerging stone age is not a step back into primitive times, but the opening of a new field that promises to bring fresh meaning to the word "ceramics." Unlike traditional ceramics such as flower pots and bricks, new advanced ceramics are exotic. They are used to package silicon chips for computers, to contain radioactive wastes and to form the tile which protect the space shuttle during reentry into the atmosphere. But this is only the beginning; the uses of high tech pottery are virtually unlimited. New ceramics can also be used for heat-resistant lenses, fiber optics, machine tools, engines, nuclear reactors, bearings and other applications.

However, if the trend of research and development of advanced ceramics continues, all future products of this technology will carry the words, "Made in Japan," because the Japanese are ahead of the United States in ceramics technology.

The United States is spending about $100 million a year on research and development, with about half of it coming from the federal government. Although this sounds like a lot of money for the government to pitch in for technological development, it doesn't compare to its technological competitor, Japan. Despite its smaller economy, Japan still spends slightly more than we do. In 1981, Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry embarked on a 10-year program to increase research in the field of advanced ceramics. A 1984 report by the National Research Council in Washington, D.C., stated that the "ceramic fever" sweeping Japan could leave America behind in developing this technology.

The stakes are so high for the future of technical ceramics that the United States needs to aggressively pursue its development if we want to continue our technological strength into the next century. H. Kent Bowen of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology predicts these ceramics will have a $20 billion world market by 1995, up from the domestic market of $2.6 billion in 1984. Despite Japan's strength in this field, its room for growth should allow U.S. industry to get a foot in the door.

For the United States to share the lead in the development of the ceramic industry, it will have to overcome limitations facing current ceramic products. Kyocera, a Japanese ceramic company, is facing some of these problems with marketing of its consumer line of ceramic carving knives and scissors; if you drop one of them, it is liable to break.

Ceramics are also expensive. The raw materials, although cheap at first, must be purified and made into fine powders. Furthermore, careful control must be used in the mixing, forming and firing of the product. Because ceramic products can't have their shape altered after they are made, they must be cooked and formed into their final shape at the same time. Any adjustments require the use of diamond-tipped tools.

New applications of ceramics by American companies would also aid in developing the industry. The properties of ceramic products have made the industry viable for expansion into several areas. Among the more prospective areas is the automobile industry where car makers want to develop a ceramic engine that will be more fuel efficient. However, cutbacks in the U.S. Department of Energy, the agency funding research of the idea, might mean the first ceramic engine will be Japanese.

Ed Strain, project head for one of these research programs being conducted by Ford Motor Co. and the Garrett Corporation, warned, "If they (Japan) succeed, America will be buying all their engines from Japan."

The health field is also promising because some ceramics are biocompatible — the body does not reject them. They could become commonplace for false teeth and joints.

In addition, America's aerospace and defense industries could be major users of the products of the new stone age. Ceramic rotors on cruise missiles, for example, could extend their range. A ceramic silicon carbide fiber called Nicalon, produced by a Japanese firm and marketed through America's Dow Corning Corp., can be woven into a cloth and used as a covering for high performance aircraft. Such products will play a major role in developing a proposed space plane.

Importing ceramics from Japan is not terrible. However, if our country is to overcome its rising trade deficit and prevent a future of lost jobs due to foreign competition, then the U.S. government and American industry need to get their act together and develop an American ceramics industry.

Iraq calls for peace

Editor,

Six years have passed since war flared between Iran and Iraq following a number of repeated Irani provocations and aggression on the Iraqi border towns. On Sept. 4, 1980, the Irani rulers intensified aggressive acts on the Iraqi borders and the Iraqis had no alternative except to defend their homeland.

The new regime in Iran utilized all of its military capacities that were built during the Shah of Iran's era to intimidate the Iraqis and interfere in their internal affairs. Khomeini's surrogates carried out subversive actions in Iraq. Car bombs were exploded in residential areas, busy shopping centers and universities in Baghdad to cause disorder and turmoil in Iraq. These aggressive acts were launched by the Khomeini regime which did not hesitate in disclosing its expansionist ambitions in Iraq and the region under his infamous slogan "Exporting the Revolution."

Khomeini exploited the ignorance, poverty and powerlessness of the Irani masses to use them in furthering his evil ambitions. Hundreds of thousands of poor peasants, factory workers, college students and even high-school boys have been forced to the battlefield to satisfy Khomeini's expansionist dreams. In spite of the high costs inflicted upon Iran, the Irani rulers are intransigent and refusing any call for a peaceful settlement.

The Iraqis were forced to enter this war to protect their homeland against the Khomeini aggression. Iraq has never had territorial ambitions in Iran. The Iraqi leader, president Saddam Hussein, has been calling for peace since the war began, while the Irani rulers insist on continuing the bloodshed.

Those who know the nature of the regime in Iran realize that Khomeini and his followers want the war to continue so they can stay in power and to divert the people's attention from the miserable situation brought upon them by the Khomeini regime. Iraq, on the other hand, has always called for peace and the last message was sent by the Hussein Aug. 2, 1986, to the Irani rulers calling for the following:

— Complete and unconditional withdrawal of both parties to their internationally recognized borders.

— Complete exchange of prisoners of war.

— Conclusion of a peace and non-aggression treaty between Iraq and Iran.

— Non-interference in internal affairs of each country and a mutual respect of each country's choices.

— Iraq and Iran should play an active role in promoting and maintaining stability in the region and in the Arab Gulf.

The unconditional call for peace by the Iraqis indicates how sincere the Iraqi leaders are in attempts to bring an end to this pointless war and to promote peace and prosperity for the people of the region and the whole world.

Reporting unbalanced

Editor,

Re: The article, "Forum addresses Star Wars defense strategies," in the Sept. 22 Collegian.

The article failed to present the forum in an unbiased context. While the forum provided equal time to both speakers, the Collegian did not. Instead, the majority of the article was focused on Alvin Compaan's points, while Hermann Donnert's comments were restricted to background information. Allowing the reporting of important events to be disproportionate in opposing view should be left to the editorial page, not the front page.

In addition, the Collegian staff should be required to record speakers when quotes are to be used. Anyone in attendance at the forum could testify Donnert did not say the United States should launch a retaliatory strike at the first indication of the Soviet Union making the first move. Rather, Donnert stated the president would be bound by the oath of office to retaliate. The Collegian writer, if supplied with the recorded transcript would have avoided using "should" instead of "must," thus slanting public views of Donnert's comments.

Finally, I believe the Collegian should review the benefits of unbiased reporting. The Sept. 22 article and the July 8, 1986, editorial on radiation preservation of food illustrate the difficulty in righting the wrongs caused by misquotes and inadequate research. Although I took the time to respond to the editorial with facts supported by research, the Collegian did not publish my letter. Instead, the Collegian chose to print an abbreviated version of a colleague's letter, thus changing its context.

Although the Collegian has reported fairly and accurately in the past, the use of recorders, more intense research and unbiased reporting, would separate the paper from second-class journalism found in most supermarkets.

Handicapped children and K-State student volunteers play with a parachute during the Family Enrichment Weekend Saturday at the Holiday Inn and Holidome. The weekend comprised fun and games for the children.

A special kind of struggle

Bragging about a child's achievements may seem routine to most parents, but if the child is handicapped those accomplishments are monumental.

"My kid is 9 years old, and when he rolled over for the first time it was such a success that the whole room was filled with both cheers and tears," said one parent of a handicapped child.

Raising a handicapped child can be a difficult struggle, but Saturday and Sunday at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome, the Families Together Enrichment Program showed the many rewards a family can experience.

A variety of handicaps were represented at the program, with some children having both physical and mental handicaps, said Barbara Huff, parent training coordinator.

"Everything was represented, from a child with a learning disability to a child who was severely multiply handicapped," Huff said.

Families Together is a support group for families with handicapped children, said Doug Gerdel, adult workshop coordinator of the program.

"We try to let the families know that they aren't alone, and there are other families out there in the same situation," Gerdel said. "We join together to become stronger."

The program was started in 1982 in Kansas by former Topeka resident Chris Curry under the philosophy, "If you get a bunch of families together, they'll figure out how to have fun and help each other out."

The Enrichment Weekend consisted of many activities and discussion groups for families with handicapped children. Each child in the family, whether handicapped or not, was given "a companion," a volunteer chaperone, for the entire weekend.

About 120 companions, mostly K-State students, helped to make the weekend a total success, said Patty Gerdel, executive director of Families Together.

"The students were wonderful chaperones; I was impressed with their ability to work with kids," she said. "When the parents know their child is taken good care of, they are able to relax and enjoy the weekend."

Patty Gerdel said three components made up the Enrichment Weekend: adult activities and discussion groups; children's activities and discussion groups; and the family fun time.

Casey Cooper, 5, son of Norm and Vicky Cooper of Wakefield, pets a rabbit with his companion for the weekend, Keith Martens.

Some of the adult activities and discussion groups were Insurance-Financial Assistance, Helping Your Child Develop Socially Acceptable Behaviors and Working with the Medical Profession.

"There were different resource people that came in for each discussion group, but the parents discussed the topic — it wasn't presented," she said. "The resource people were trained professionals in the area, but they were there merely to answer questions about the topic."

The second component, children's activities, was probably the most fun to watch, Patty Gerdel said. The children were divided into groups containing both the disabled and able, and they went to many different half-hour sessions.

Some of the sessions were magic shows, arts and crafts, a petting zoo, storytelling, swimming and clowns.

"For my child, the parachute activity was the most fun. The activity of running underneath and then back out of the parachute excited my child," said Lora Lovitt, companion and senior in special education.

Family fun time, the third component, was a chance for the whole family to do an activity together, Patty Gerdel said. Playing miniature golf and making balloon animals were two of the many family activities.

One of the main benefits the family receives is the "uplifting" experience of the entire weekend, she said.

"The family comes and sees other disabled children, and they can always see someone else in a worse situation," she said. "It makes it easier to handle their own child's handicap.

Huff also said the experience allows the families to see how others handle similar problems with their disabled children.

"The weekend gives the family a chance to reframe their own problems," Huff said. "They (the families) look at another family with a handicapped child and say 'I couldn't cope with that handicap,' and it gives them the strength to cope with their own."

One family described the weekend as a "shot in the arm," Patty Gerdel said. "A lot of the families come at a transitional time, preschool to grade school or grade school to junior high, and the support they get through other parents who have already experienced the period with their child is rejuvenating."

Not only was the weekend a rewarding experience for the participating families, but the companions learned a great deal, Lovitt said.

"It (the weekend) gives us a chance to look at the family and handicapped child together," she said.

Patty Gerdel said there were not many times when the chaperones of a handicapped activity get to meet the whole family.

"My favorite part of the weekend was not only working with Neil, but his parents, too. They were really encouraging and tried to help me feel relaxed and comfortable," said Patty Rietcheck, companion and junior in elementary/special education.

"It has been a real eye-opener," she said. "I'd never really been around handicapped children, and I was always a little afraid of approaching them. The weekend took away the fear, and it made me realize how each child has something to give.

"Even though my child, Neil, couldn't truly communicate during one of the activities, he reached out to me and gave me a hug and a kiss," she said.

"One of the benefits I gained from the weekend was watching a day-in and day-out activity of their family life — lunch," said Jennifer Bowles, companion and graduate student in special education. "It was a messy experience, but it showed me what these families go through every day."

Families Together is funded by a federal grant and private contributions, Patty Gerdel said. For the 25 participating families, the cost was $300 dollars per family. The grant paid for the administrative costs to run the program. Private contributions from businesses, foundations and many other organizations paid for at least two-thirds, if not all of the expenses for the families, she said.

"Families Together is more than an enrichment weekend. We try to follow up through our resource center in Topeka and through small workshops throughout the year," she said.

"These are very emotional weekends, and we feel being able to end on a positive note is important," Doug Gerdel said. "We end the weekends with a session called 'Sharing Success.'"

"It's a time for the parents to talk to others without embarrassment about their child's accomplishments," Rietcheck said.

Farmers discovering state flower as profitable cash crop

By LONNY GEIMAN
Collegian Reporter

Helianthus annus' roots are buried deeply in the Kansas soil. She's been an upright citizen of the state for many years and has been honored as the recipient of an award a lot of young bloomers would be happy to receive. She is the state flower.

Binomial nomenclature aside, Helianthus annus is one sunflower species.

Seeing a sunflower every summer day may not be uncommon to Kansans — it may even be regarded as a weed to some individuals — but the state flower is much more complicated than just an "average weed."

During the last few years, the sunflower has begun to become more popular in crop production, said Clenton Owensby, professor of agronomy.

He said this is because the sunflower is very durable and grows well in soils ranging in texture from sand to clay. These types of soil do not require as high fertility as crops like corn and wheat.

Sunflowers, he said, are raised for their oil and seed production. In the area of Kansas however, seed production is more popular.

The sunflower is harvested much in the same manner of wheat or corn, using a combine with a header similar to one used when harvesting wheat or corn. The sunflower is also planted as a row crop similar to other Kansas crops.

Owensby said Helianthus is the common name for members of the North American genus of annual and perennial herbs.

"There are many different sunflowers," Owensby said, possibly 600 separate species. While many of these are wild, some have been developed through breeding practices for production usage.

The sunflower has flourished as more than a weed — it is now part of agricultural development. The species Helianthus annus is the world's second most important source of vegetable oil.

"There are 11 native wild sunflowers in Kansas," Owensby said, adding that there are three basic types of sunflowers in Kansas.

The first is the Helianthus annus. It is reproduced in the wild by seeds blown off the plant. They can be seen standing almost anywhere they can bury their roots.

"The Helianthus annus can grow as tall as 8 feet," Owensby said.

He said a sunflower this tall has a very thick stalk and can be a problem in farmers' fields.

The Helianthus annus seeds from August through October after starting to produce flowers in July.

The second notable sunflower species in Kansas is the Helianthus ciliaris, also known as the Blue weed or Blue sunflower, which reproduces through rhizomes and seeds.

This species has been found in only three counties in Kansas and has only been noticed in cultivated fields. It is believed that this species was brought into Kansas by cattle shipments from Texas.

The species, which stands approximately 3 feet high, gets the label "blue" because its large face has a bluish tint.

The third popular Kansas sunflower is the Helianthus petiolaris, also known as the Plains sunflower or the Sand sunflower, and is much like the Helianthus annus species. It seeds and flowers at the same time and grows in the same locations. The Helianthus Petiolaris grows to a maximum height of about 6 feet and has grayish-brown tips in the center of its face.

But Owensby said the value of growing the sunflower for its byproducts has not yet been established on a large-scale basis, causing some to still consider it a menacing weed.

"Sunflowers are not considered a noxious weed," he said. Wild sunflowers can easily be controlled by chemicals and mowing.

But Dennis Peterson, director of the Riley County Weed Department, said sunflowers can be a menace.

"We are not ever real concerned about the sunflower," Peterson said. "We spray mainly for other weeds along roadsides and in fields, but the chemicals we use help in controlling the sunflower."

Farmers often find the wild sunflower a problem. They can grow as high as 6 to 8 feet tall, with thick and tough stalks. This often creates problems during the harvesting of wheat.

"We try to spray hard during the spring and early in the fall," Peterson said. He said he believes these spraying times are the most beneficial.

"The sunflower this year was very abundant in Kansas," Peterson said. He credited this to the large amount of rainfall in Kansas this year.

"Sunflowers love water," Peterson said. He said they were kept pretty busy this spring controlling weeds, and the sunflower was no exception.

Goodland processes sunflower products

By The Collegian Staff

Ag Dynamics Systems Inc., the first sunflower hauling and processing plant in Kansas, had its official opening Sept. 19 in Goodland.

"Ag Dynamics Systems Inc. has the capacity to process 50 million pounds of sunflowers a year," said Mike Nelson, plant operations manager.

"The sunflowers we use are grown in a 100-mile radius of Goodland," Nelson said. "Northwest Kansas is a very good area for growing sunflowers. This area can produce the largest and the best-looking seeds in the industry."

"The sunflower seeds are either sold to distributors and plants that roast and salt the sunflowers or packaged at our plant," Nelson said. "At our plant, the seeds are packaged for bird feed or packaged in their natural form for human consumption."

The sunflower products are shipped throughout the world, Nelson said. Areas receiving products from the Goodland plant include Mexico, Canada, Western Europe and the Far East. Products are also distributed throughout the United States.

Prior to the opening of the hauling plant in Kansas, the only other plants built specifically for the hauling and processing of sunflowers in the area were located in North Dakota, Nelson said.

Kansas has the advantage of having a longer growing season for sunflowers than North Dakota. Kansas' growing season, which lasts from May to October, allows the sunflowers to mature fully, providing a better quality product, Nelson said.

initiatives. He said his administration has provided more help to farmers than the last five administrations combined, but added that money alone is not the solution to farmers' problems.

Reagan stressed that lowering interest rates and allowing access to foreign markets will provide a better answer for the farming economy.

Supporting a strong defense program, Reagan said, "I am most proud of the men and women in uniform...they are all volunteers and they have the highest level of education ever.

"They are one fine bunch. If we ever ask them to put their lives on the line, I don't want to give them anything less than the top equipment."

Call's ability inspires K-State

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

There are two sides to Shawnee Call during a volleyball match. Between points she is K-State's unofficial cheerleader, exhorting her teammates on with enthusiasm and encouragement.

During each point, however, her entire concentration is focused on one particular point, intensity etched in her eyes.

Coach Scott Nelson is full of praise for his talented sophomore.

"Shawnee is just one of the real unique athletes we have at Kansas State," Nelson said. "I think she has a lot of talents that are God-given, yet she's a real team player. She doesn't let those things put her above anyone else. In a team sport like ours, that's real important for success of the team as well as the individual."

Call, No. 9 on the roster and the Wildcats' leader in several statistical categories, also serves as the team's captain in place of injured Mary Kinsey. Call has been named to all-tournament teams in each of the three tourneys in which the 'Cats have participated.

She was also chosen as most valuable player in the 10th Annual K-State Invitational Sept. 12-13, despite the fact K-State finished second.

Nelson attributes her success to a tremendous amount of physical talent paired with her ever-present intensity.

"She's the quickest athlete I've ever had. She's the most explosive, the highest-jumping, but she also has an intensity about her that isn't a negative intensity to the team. It's not a complaining intensity. It's a 'Let's win this match' intensity, 'Let's strive for success' sort of thing," he said.

"I like to get people (her teammates) enthusiastic. I like to get everybody pumped up and excited about playing good volleyball," Call said of her on-court enthusiasm.

While her intensity is beneficial to the team, some people, such as Nelson, believe at times it causes her to press too hard.

"Sometimes I think she feels she has to carry too much of the load," Nelson said. "I think sometimes she puts such high goals on herself that they're hard to achieve."

For instance, earlier this season when the 'Cats were struggling while Kinsey and senior Helen Bundy were out with injuries, Call said, she tried to shoulder too much of the burden.

"I did (put too much pressure on myself)," Call said, "but Scott made it apparent to me that the only thing you can do is go out and play to the best of your ability. You can't worry about if we're going to win or lose...I think that's helped me out a lot."

Nelson said he noticed something special about Call when he saw her play for Ellsworth High School.

"When I'd watch her in high school, playing under pressure and when it was time to win, she'd always rise to the occasion," Nelson said. "I'm seeing that at a college level now."

'She's the quickest athlete I've ever had. She's the most explosive...but she also has an intensity about her that isn't...negative.'
— Coach Scott Nelson

While teammates and foes alike have been awed by her play this year, Call is somewhat cautious in her assessment of her own performance.

"There's always room for improvement," she said. "On certain days I'm happy with my play, but I always feel like I can do better."

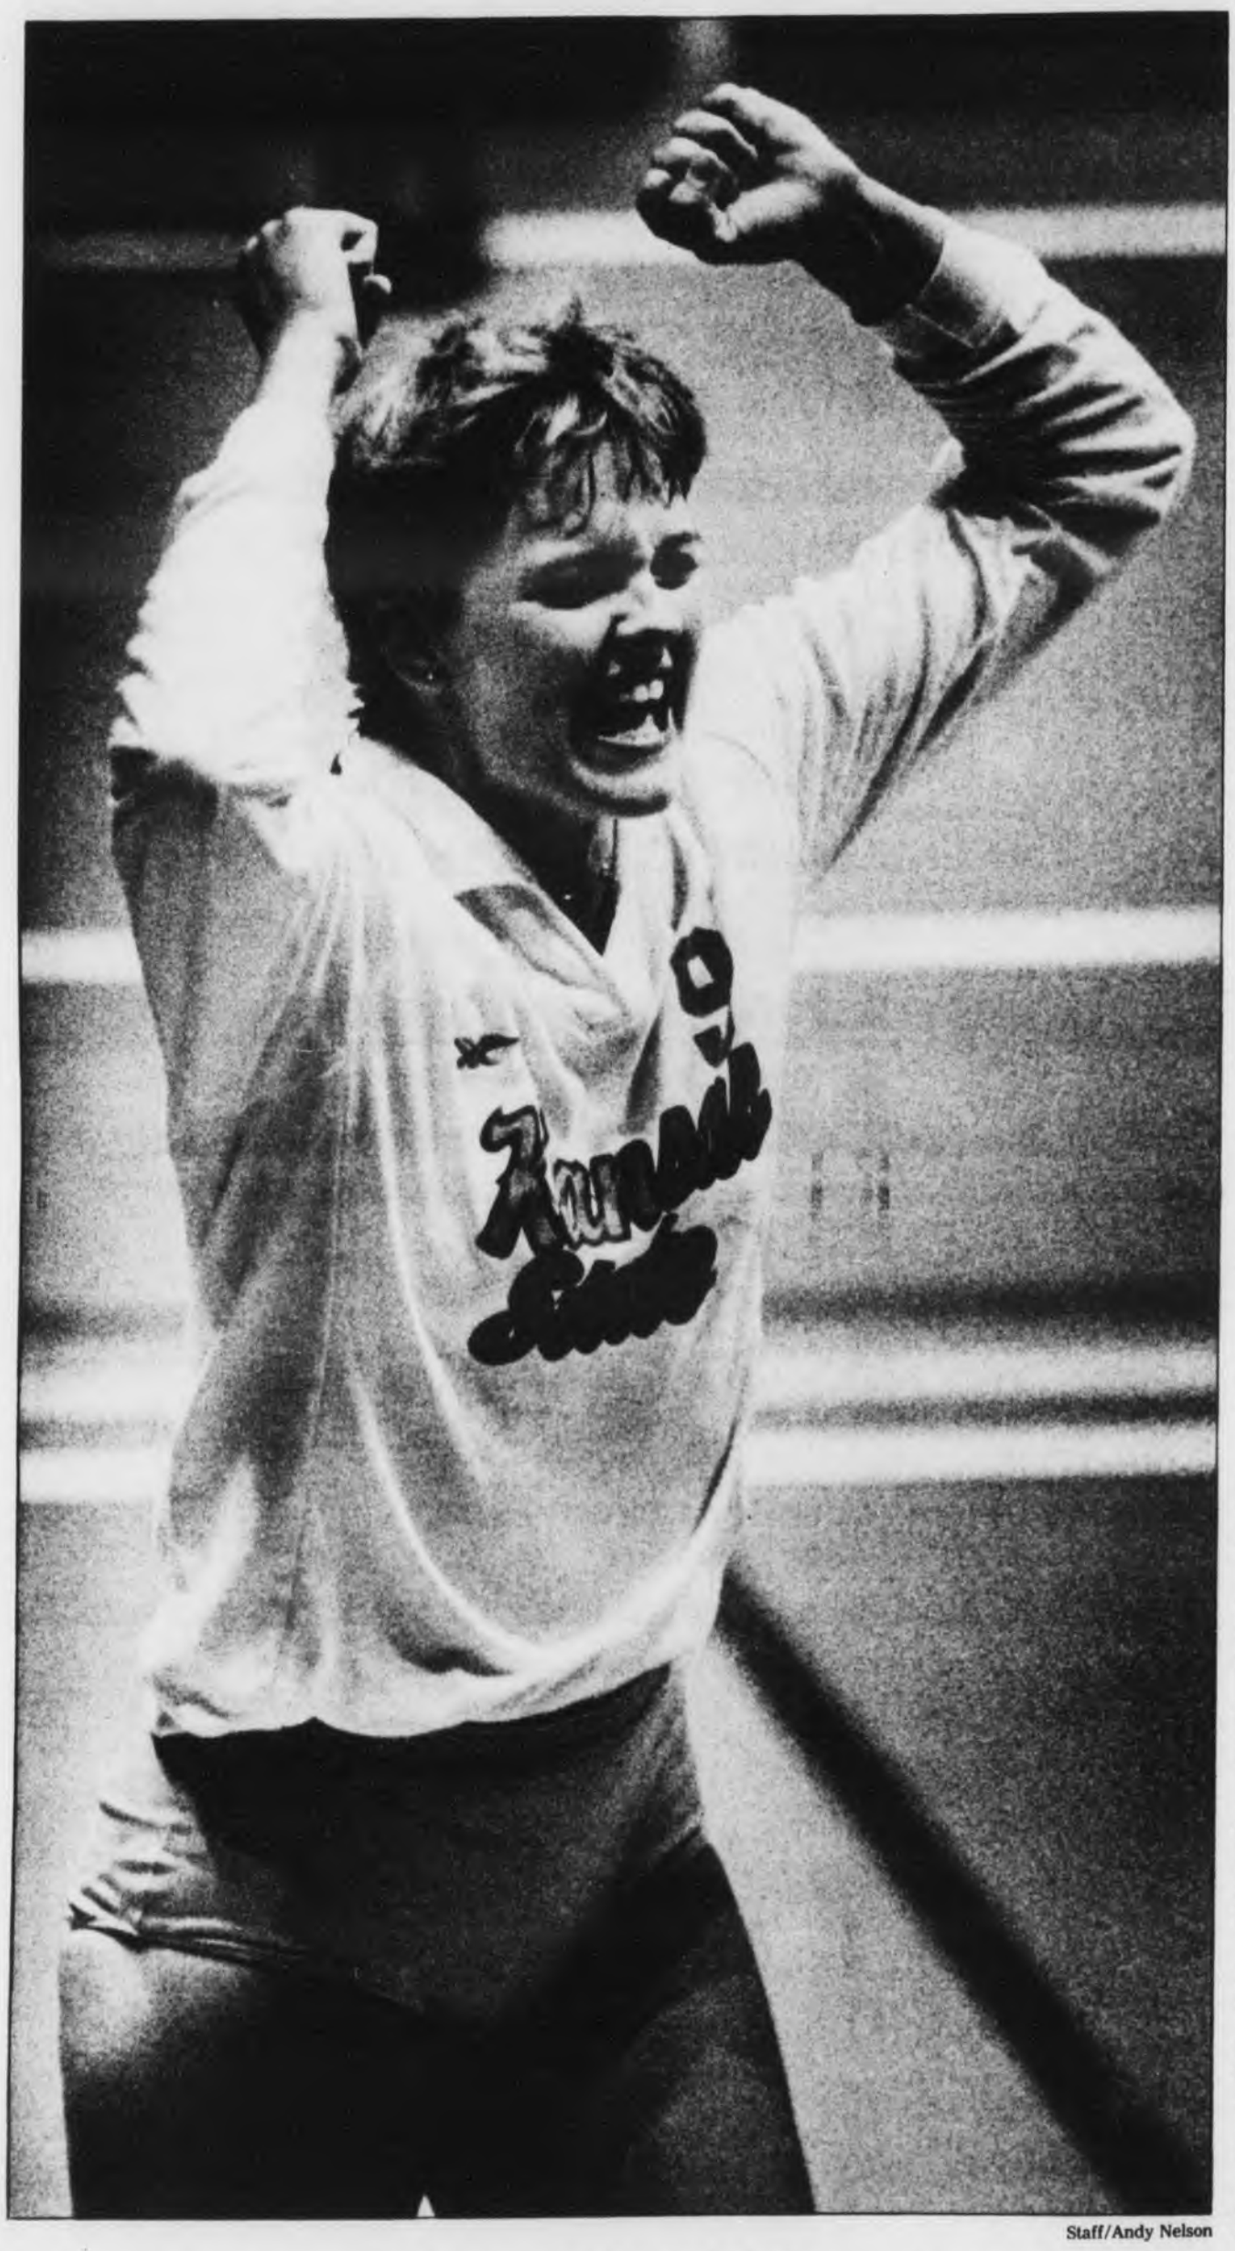
She added that consistency is one area where there is room for improvement, although she has seen definite progress in that area since last year.

"A big goal of mine is to play consistent and never get down on myself and try to keep my level of play at a very consistent level, at a high level," she said.

Despite her immense physical talents, Call attributes much of her success to her work habits which date back to her high-school days.

"I knew I wanted to continue my athletics, and I think that's what made me work harder in high school," Call said.

"I work hard because I enjoy it," she added. "I really enjoy playing. I love athletics; I always have. I like competing," said Call, who also lettered in track and basketball during her high-school career.



Excitement shines in Nelson's eyes when he considers how outstanding Call could be after two more years.

"I'm real impressed with Shawnee," he said. "I think she's got a great deal of potential that goes beyond Kansas State."

Call has a particular goal for when her K-State volleyball days are over.

"Eventually, I'd like to try out for the Olympics and play in the Olympics," she said.

And watching No. 9 during a 'Cats match, one realizes that her goal is not unrealistic.

Bietau's recruiting prepares Wildcats for future success

By TONY CARBAJO
Sports Writer

Editor's Note: This is the fifth in a series featuring K-State athletic coaches. The series will appear Tuesdays on the sports page.

Steve Bietau can honestly say he didn't come to K-State to rebuild the women's team, because nothing was there to reconstruct.

The Coaches of K-State

"I think as far as (K-State's) women's program is concerned, we basically started from nothing," said Bietau, the Wildcats' third-year tennis coach. "The women had been ignored, or at the very least, put on the back burner."

Bietau, 31, came to K-State from Hutchinson Community College where he guided the Blue Dragons to a 13th place national junior college finish in 1983.

But Bietau left Hutchinson to lead a 'Cats team that had never enjoyed a better finish than sixth in the Big Eight Conference, and was strapped with the lowest budget in the conference as well. He quickly discovered he didn't have talent to compete at the Big Eight level, so he initiated a two-step plan to mold a competitive team.

He primarily recruited nationwide for players who could step into the No. 1 and 2 spots, and then he went in search of quality Kansans to fill the remaining four positions.

Bietau said two "good recruiting years" have begun to transform his plans into reality.

"It is difficult when you start out and look at where you want to be and where you actually are," Bietau said. "If you look at where we were and where we want to be, we have taken enormous steps.

"We are trying to break that (losing) barrier," he said. "We are trying to do a lot of things people on the outside don't think we can do."

One of Bietau's tasks has been lifted this season. Instead of trying to upgrade two programs, men's and women's, he was left with only the women's team after the athletic department chose last spring to discontinue the men's program and women's softball program.

It is a situation he is hesitant to discuss. After spending two years with many of the players, Bietau looked on from the inside as the men's team faced an uncertain future.

"It is a bad situation for individuals any time you drop a program," Bietau said. "I could sit here and tell you a 100 stories of what it did to them. The players felt abandonded by the school, and they were really. Some instances, they felt abandonded by me.

"My goal is not to have an easier job because I have one less

Rugby team loses, 11-6

By The Collegian Staff

University of Kansas defeated the K-State rugby club 11-6 in the first match of the Topeka-Kaw Valley Rugby Cup tournament Saturday in Topeka.

KU led 8-0 at halftime, and went on to post a 5-point victory over the K-State club. K-State scored on a 10-meter run by Bill Knopick, and a 20-meter penalty kick by Paul Emmerson.

K-State went on to place third in the four-team tournament by notching a 12-4 victory over Ft. Leavenworth in the consolation match. Topeka took the championship with a 28-10 trouncing of KU.

The rugby club will travel Oct. 18 to Swope Park in Kansas City, Mo., for a match against the Kansas City Blues.

Schedule gives Bears good outlook

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — A warning to those other NFL teams with championship ambitions: with the first quarter of the 1986 season gone, this year's version of the Chicago Bears isn't much different than last year's.

It's not so much that the Bears have finished the first quarter unbeaten and have a soft schedule that makes 14-2, 15-1 or even 16-0 a distinct possibility. It's that they went from 3-0 to 4-0 in the same manner they won last year — faced with a threat to their dominance, they crushed the challenger.

Sunday's score in question was Bears 44, Bengals 7, in a game that was supposed to be Chicago's toughest after undistingushed efforts against Cleveland, Philadelphia and Green Bay. In fact, at least half the nation's all-knowing pundits picked the Bears to lose.

Instead, the result was the same as last year when Chicago would stumble against Tampa Bay and Indianapolis, then go out and beat the good teams by 44-0 (Dallas), 45-10 (Washington) or a combined 91-10 (Giants, Rams and Patriots in the playoffs).

"That's the world championship team we saw out there," said Cincinnati Coach Sam Wyche, whose team was done in by the return of Jim McMahon, who threw for three touchdowns, and renewed intensity that might have been a reaction to those people who picked the Bengals.

Where does that leave the rest of the NFL after the first quarter of the season?

That includes the expected contenders — Redskins (4-0), Giants (3-1), 49ers (3-1), Rams (3-1) and Cowboys (2-1 going into Monday night's game in St. Louis) and a couple of still unproven upstarts — the Falcons (4-0) and Vikings (3-1). The latter two are about to be tested.

The Vikings, whose record may be a factor of playing the inept Steelers and Packers back-to-back, play the Bears twice and 49ers in the next three weeks and also have the Redskins and Giants coming up. The Falcons, who barely got by Tampa Bay after upsetting Dallas, play the Eagles this week, then face and eight-week stretch of reality: Rams, 49ers, Rams, Patriots, Jets, Bears, 49ers and Dolphins.

In the AFC, Denver (4-0) is slowly becoming a dominant team as John Elway slowly becomes a dominant quarterback. The 27-20 win Sunday over the Patriots made the Broncos the clear standout for the first quarter-season but they still have the bulk of their division games to go plus the dangerous NFC East threesome of the Cowboys, Giants and Redskins.

Lined up behind the Broncos are the Patriots (2-2) plus the Seahawks (3-1) and Jets (3-1). The Raiders and Dolphins, off to 1-3 starts, lurk in the shadows and Cincinnati and Cleveland at 2-2 are the best of the still somnambulant Central Divison.

But can anyone beat the Bears?

Not according to the gentleman who coaches them.

Coaches never lose No. 1 fan's support

By ROGER McKNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

It doesn't matter if they win or lose, most coaches can always count on the support of their No. 1 fan — their spouse.

"I don't think it takes any special qualities to be a coach's wife. As with any spouse, you must think highly of them and care very strongly about the person and what they do," said Barbara Kruger, wife of men's basketball coach Lon Kruger.

Ruth Parrish, wife of football coach Stan Parrish, said daily routines must revolve around the coach's schedule.

"One of the major differences in being a coach's spouse is that you spend a lot of time away from your husbands, especially on weekends," Parrish said.

And, as Kruger has discovered, a coach's schedule can be somewhat unpredictable.

"Being a coach's wife, you can't follow a set schedule. Coaching is not a job that you can set the routine of coming home at five o'clock, setting down at the dinner table at 5:30 and then plan out our evenings. We make lots of last minute plans," Kruger said.

Each spouse has a different way in which they cope with pressures associated with coaching.

"I try to attend all the women's basketball games," said Ken Mossman, administrative assistant for the athletic department and husband of women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman.

Attending games also prepares the spouse for any situations connected with the game's outcome that the spouse might be confronted with at home, he added.

'The Sleeping Beauty' shows ballet troupe's excellent form

If the old rule, "A ballet company is only as good as its worst dancer," is true, then Houston Ballet Company is in excellent shape.

Dance Review

The company performed the classical ballet "The Sleeping Beauty" to a sellout crowd Monday night in McCain Auditorium. This ballet, an adaptation of the children's fairy tale, opens with the christening of the Princess Aurora.

Six Fairies present the child with gifts, including beauty, generosity, charm, song and temperment. Just before the Lilac Fairy presents her gift, the party is interrupted by the appearance of the wicked fairy Carabosse. Angry because she had not been invited, Carabosse delivers a curse upon Aurora: she will some day prick her finger and die. The Lilac Fairy intervenes, promising the princess will only sleep until awakened by a prince's kiss.

Act 1 is Aurora's 16th birthday, and a festive ball takes place. Aurora is presented with four possible suitors with whom she dances.

As she dances, the disguised Carabosse hands her a bouquet of flowers, which conceals a spindle. She pricks her finger, and as she falls the Lilac Fairy appears and casts her spell.

In the second act, Prince Florimund, out hunting with his friends, comes upon the sleeping princess and with a kiss brings her and the rest of the kingdom back to life.

Act 3 is the wedding celebration of Aurora and Florimund. Characters from other fairy tales join in the celebration.

The true spark of the performance was the precision and expertise of the Corps de Ballet. Like the brilliance of a polished gem, the corps of 11 men and 11 women sparkled with high energy and obvious joy in performing.

The lead role of Aurora was danced by Rachel Jonell Beard. Her performance started out a little shaky and rushed, but she seemed to warm to the audience's overly generous applause and finished Act 1 holding nothing back.

Her Act 2 pas de deux with Prince Florimund, danced by John Grensback, was breathtakingly beautiful. Well-suited to each other physically, their interpretation of the stirring music by Tchaikovsky was lyrical and romantic. Grensback's solos were well-executed; danced with exhilarating speed and abandon.

An especially noteworthy performance was that of Lauren Anderson as the Fairy Temperament. Anderson, a favorite of Manhattan audiences last season in Houston's performance of Giselle, again set the stage ablaze with her commanding presence. Kudos also go to Kristine Richmond, who danced the role of Carabosse, the wicked fairy. Richmond seemed to have a lot of fun with the role, snarling at the audience and flashing her incredibly long green fingernails.

The male dancers were technically proficient and seemed to excel in virtouso roles such as that of The Ivans in the third and final act. This dance, performed by Rafe Wooley, Joseph Woelfel and Timothy O'Keefe was clearly a favorite of the audience. It was interrupted several times by enthusiastic applause, as the three executed difficult and daring acrobatic moves.

Stevenson staged the ballet following the original choreography of Marius Petipa. His interpretation was imaginative and entertaining. The rich and elegant costuming designed by Pete Farmer, elaborate sets, also by Farmer, lighting by Tony Tucci and special effects all combined to give a magical feeling to the surroundings.

Bravo, Houston Ballet on a fine performance!

"As far as winning and losing matches," Bietau said, "we haven't gotten far enough along to see success in the conference yet. When you look down the conference and see where we have started to go, we have felt good about it.

"This is an important year for us," he added. "We believe we are capable of making a noticeable improvement in the conference this year...We have a chance to do something that has never been done here before."

Time magazine art critic gives lecture

Robert Hughes, Time magazine art critic, initiates the Lee A. Bryant Lecture Series in Architecture and Design. His lecture Monday was "The Uneasy Alliance: Art and Architecture in the Late Twentieth Century."

By LAURA HACKLEY
Collegian Reporter

Robert Hughes, noted scholar and art critic for Time magazine, delivered the first of the Lee A. Bryant Lecture Series in Architecture and Design Monday in Forum Hall.

Hughes' topic, "The Uneasy Alliance: Art and Architecture in the Late 20th Century," reflects the strong interest in art and architecture of K-State alumnus Lee A. Bryant, in whose memory the lecture series was founded. The initial endowment for the program was given to KSU Foundation by his widow, Lynne Bryant, and many of his friends.

Allen Goodman, instuctor of architectural engineering and construction science, approached the podium before the standing-room-only crowd to talk a little about Bryant.

"I'd like to paint a picture for you of Kansas State University and a friend of mine," Goodman said, beginning his description of what an architecture student's life was like 25 years ago, when Bryant was a student.

Students would sit in Seaton Hall until all hours of the morning, discussing the "virtue of our own existence and what is architecture," Goodman said.

Goodman also discussed the unusual background of Bryant, who found out while in college he had cancer. Bryant volunted for a special treatment not tested extensively and successfully continued with his life.

Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture, introduced Hughes and gave overview of his books. "Art of Australia," Hughes' first book, was written shortly after college. "Heaven Hell in Western Art" was his next edition. "The Shock of the New," his latest work, was an eight-part television series for BBC/Time-Life.

Hughes' slide-illustrated lecture included examples of what he thought were good and bad examples of art and architecture. He favored many of the older sculptures of Venice, Paris and Rome and criticized many modern sculptures, including the sculpture outside the Time Life building where he works.

"Even the pigeons avoid it," Hughes said.

Architects of the 1950s, Hughes said, attempted to copy older styles of architecture in a cheaper way and ended up with the dull square buildings of current city landscapes.

Throughout the lecture Hughes showed a very strong opinion of contemporary architecture and memorials. Hughes said instead of the monuments to political figures common in centuries past, contemporary society has the media. Television is now the way political figures live on in society.

Hughes spoke of a loss of murals and ornaments in contemporary buildings while showing slides of designs and paintings in churches.

"Ornament mediates between nature and culture. It embroiders and glorifies the architecture," Hughes said.

Hughes ended his lecture by saying he doesn't believe there will be a true alliance of art and architecture any time soon.

"No one can claim that they are together now," Hughes said.

During a question-and-answer session a student asked his opinion of the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C. Hughes said he thought most of the memorial worked well and was a good monument to grieve for the dead without glorifying the need for aggression.

Daniloff

Shultz and Shevardnadze had met for three hours late Sunday in New York. It was the fourth unannounced meeting between the two men in six days.

The Daniloff case has been one of several problems blocking progress toward arranging a second summit between President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

While the U.S. concern was focused on the spy charges filed against Daniloff, the Soviets objected strongly to the U.S. decision to expell 25 Soviet diplomats attached to their U.N. mission. All have been ordered to depart by Wednesday.

The United States, contending that the mission is excessively large and engages in spy activities, has ordered a phased withdrawal of 105 Soviet diplomats over a two-year period.

Shultz has indicated that the explusion order is not negotiable, but Soviet spokesman Gennady Gerasimov has suggested that Moscow will retaliate unless the decision is reversed.

Daniloff was arrested by eight KGB agents after, he said, a Soviet acquaintance handed him a package which he believed to contain press clippings.

When the package was opened at Moscow's Lefortovo Prison, it turned out to be filled with maps marked secret and photographs of Soviet military installations, equipment and soldiers.

The KGB held Daniloff at the prison until Sept. 12, putting him through 30 hours of intensive interrogation, before releasing him to the U.S. Embassy's custody.

Sanctions

South Africans.

The new steps would expand a list of sanctions Reagan issued last year, but would fall short of the other measures call for in legislation passed by the House and Senate.

In contrast, the legislation passed by Congress bans all new investment and all new bank loans, ends landing rights in the United States for South African aircraft, and bans the import not only of South African iron and steel but also coal, textiles, uranium, arms, food and agricultural products. It also would bar the export of petroleum products to South Africa and award the South African sugar import quota to the Philippines.

Reagan said also that his executive order clearly would amount to a complete and comprehensive statement of U.S. policy toward South Africa "with the intent of preempting inconsistent state and local laws" aimed in one way or another against the apartheid system.

And he repeated the theme of his veto message last Friday that the sanctions approved by Congress would hurt "the victims of the apartheid system" and not the whites-only government that has made apartheid a principal instrument of social control.

Reaction

cases, the United States has treated Daniloff and Zakharov as two completely different cases.

"From what I've read, the Soviets have trumped up the charges against Daniloff," Rosenberg said. "I don't think the Reagan administration would have made such a strong statement about the Daniloff situation unless they thought that was the case."

Even if there is a mutual release of prisoners, this should not show the Russians that they can kidnap a journalist every time the United States catches a Soviet spy, Richter said.

Richter said he thinks the Soviet Union feels that they responded correctly when they arrested Daniloff for two reasons.

"First, the Soviets think that Zakharov was set up, too," Richter said. "Generally, people like Zakharov are sent out of the country if they are caught spying, but in this case he was arrested."

Rosenberg said he doesn't think the release will have an effect on a possible second summit meeting between the United States and the Soviet Union.

"I don't think it will engender the spirit of cooperation between the U.S. and the Soviet Union," he said. "It is hard for them to say that one person is crucial to something as important as arms control."

Richter said the United States has enough difficulties dealing with adversaries without the Daniloff issue overshadowing and further straining U.S.-Soviet relations.

Untraditional cure proves effective against colic

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

A unique method of hanging a horse upside down to cure a particular type of colic was recently performed at the Veterinary Hospital.

In August, a large Clydesdale draft horse weighing about 1700-1800 pounds, was hung upside down in an attempt to dislodge a dislocated intestine.

Colic, which is defined as acute abdominal pain or discomfort, is fairly common in horses, said Richard DeBowes, assistant professor of surgery and medicine. DeBowes, along with Judy Cox, associate professor of surgery and medicine, performed the manipulative technique for colonic repositioning.

DeBowes estimated that possibly as many as one in five horses undergo colic at some point.

The procedure, which is an old technique for cattle modified by the Germans for use in horses, can cure only one particular type of colic — Nephro Splenic Ligament Contraption, he said.

This condition occurs when the left dorsal and ventral large colons slide between the body wall and the spleen, and venture up the left side of the body wall in the abdomen, getting hooked up over the top of the spleen in a ligament between the spleen and the kidney, he said.

When this happens, gas or fluid accumulates in the bowel as it begins twisting on itself and sliding up in between the lining of the body cavity and the speen.

While colic may have hundreds of different cases, only this particular kind of intestinal displacement can be cured by the "hanging" technique, DeBowes said.

"You can hang them (horses having other colic conditions) upside down for weeks and it's not going to change anything," he said.

The new procedure, which takes about 20 minutes, involves laying the anesthetized horse down on its right side, allowing the spleen to fall back out of the way, so that by reaching in through the rectum, the intestines can be pushed out of the compartment defined by the top of the spleen, the kidney and the ligament, DeBowes said.

A set of hobbles are then placed on both the front and back legs and a single hook brings the limbs together so that the horse can be lifted up on a hoist with its abdomen pointing to the sky.

The horse is lifted off the table and "wiggled" so that the organs in the abdomen are moving. Gas in the intestine allows it to rise into what would be the bottom of the horses abdomen.

The horse is then lowered back onto the table and rolled onto its left side, allowing the intestine to fall back into its proper position. The horse is awakened and pushed up on its left side so the intestine can resume its proper position.

Much of the time that the horse is "hanging" its back is actually in contact with the table, DeBowes said. The horse must be positioned where most of its weight is lifted off of it, but not so much as to where it damages blood vessels and nerves in the limbs.

"I found it (the procedure) to be really exhausting," DeBowes said. The Clydesdale was so large that it took much strength and endurance as well as finesse to reach in through the rectum and try to move things around, he said. The intestines cannot be forced around because if the colon is torn the horse will die.

Colic in horses is mostly due to parasites, blood supply problems to the intestine or a twisted intestine, he said. A horse with acute colic may show signs of an anxious look, sweating, pawing at the ground, biting at its flanks, or shifting back and forth in its posture. Horses having a more intense colic may kick at their bellies, breathe very hard, and hunch over, fall down and roll.

Both a rectal examination and diagnostic synography (ultrasound) are used to determine if a horse has this particular disease. Because a horse can have more than one problem at a time, it does not tell whether or not there is a second problem as well, DeBowes said.

The standard treatment for correcting this specific type of colic is to perform a midline surgery with the horse on its back under general anesthesia, and reposition the colon from off the top of the spleen.

Although the new treatment involves anesthetizing the horse, it is a shorter-acting anesthesia that does not have to be as deep, DeBowes said. Because there is no incision made, this eliminates putting the horse through some of the morbidity of surgery, DeBowes said. Also, the cost of surgery is generally between $1200 to $1500, and the larger the horse, the more anesthetic problems it may have with muscular and nerve compression following surgery.

It is important to follow through with good preventative health care for a horse, DeBowes said. Good feeding practices and parasite control are the two most important steps likely to prevent this disease, he said.

Seminar addresses proper diet, exercise

By LISA CARLIN
Collegian Reporter

People can finally have their cake and eat it, too.

That is the message of Food and Fitness for Life, a 10-week seminar sponsored by Memorial Hospital. The seminar, which will be offered at 9:30 a.m., 5:30 p.m. and 8 p.m. on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, begins today and Wednesday at Memorial Hospital.

The first goal of the seminar is to teach people to regulate food intake internally, said Jeanne Dray, registered dietitian, instructor of foods and nutrition and consultant for the seminar.

"We want people to learn to eat when they're hungry and stop eating when they're full," Dray said.

Food and Fitness for Life also encourages aerobic activity to increase the metabolic rate and burn off fat, she said.

'Food, fitness for life' seminar's theme

The key to weight loss is keeping the weight off, because only 5 percent of people who lose weight are able to do so, Dray said.

The seminar includes classes based on the book "The 'Diet': A Manual for a Healthy Way of Living." She said guest speakers and various kinds of pre- and post-testing will also be incorporated in the classes.

Dray will teach the sessions based on the book, written by Eunice Bassler, Susan Davis and Susan Watt. The book includes instructional sessions about the nutritional value of foods, importance of exercise, sample recipes and suggestions about self-assessment and goal-setting in a weight-loss and regulation program.

Each lesson also contains a belief assessment section to determine current opinions about diet and exercise, and a discussion section, which provides factual information and guidelines for learning more about current eating and dieting concerns.

One of the guest speakers for the program will be Katharine Grunewald, associate professor of foods and nutrition, who will discuss the influence of exercise on weight regulation. Also, a local physician will talk about the physiology of hunger and surgical weight regulation techniques. A local psychologist will address the psychological and social aspects of eating, Dray said.

Before-and-after testing for the seminar, including cardiovascular fitness testing, percentage of body fat testing and flexibility and strength testing will be conducted by Memorial Hospital physical therapy staff, Dray said. There will also be a before-and-after eating attitudes test, she said.

Dray said the seminar will teach participants about nutrient density, which is the percentage of nutrients in food, and also how to plan meals and snacks. A food with several nutrients and low calorie content is what people should look for, Dray said.

Food and Fitness For Life is interested more in how much fat and muscle the body is composed of rather than actual weight. And, as the seminar's name suggests, the emphasis is on slowly relearning and maintaining good diet and exercise habits for the rest of the participant's life, she said.

The cost for the seminar is $125 a person, but Dray said when compared with other programs in the area that can cost up to four times as much for the same amount of time, it's a good deal.

Architect to lecture about ancient ruins

By DON SCOTT
Collegian Reporter

British scholar and European architecture expert William Taylor will present "Into The Labyrinth: The Bronze Age Palace At Knossos" at 7:30 tonight in Kedzie 106.

The lecture will cover excavation and preservation of the ruins on the Isle of Crete and an attempt to understand its meaning, Taylor said.

The lecture will be illustrated by various slides showing many different aspects of the palace. Measured drawings and photographs can be viewed on exhibit in Seaton 205.

Taylor was invited to visit the campus for two weeks by Ron Hess, head of the Department of Architecture.

Taylor said that in his visit to K-State, he hopes to give students a new adventure in architecture.

"I'm really looking forward to getting involved with the students," Taylor said.

Taylor was a deputy department head at Oxford University School of Architecture where he specialized in Aegean and Greek structures from 1952 until his retirement in 1981. His home is located in Northumberland, England.

"We are very fortunate to have someone of his status and quality here," Hess said.

Taylor said he met Hess in 1972 when Hess went to Oxford as an exchange staff member.

During his visit, Taylor will be giving a series of lectures on pre-Classical and Classical Greek architecture.

In addition to giving lectures, Taylor was also invited to sit in on an architecture design studio class. During the class time, Taylor critiqued some of the projects the students designed.

Because it was the students' first project, Taylor said, a person has to "make allowances" when criticizing.

"On the whole, most were very imaginative and some were quite good," Taylor said. "The problems of creativity is architects and their communications have to be coped with, and at this stage in their career the evidence on display is very promising."

"He's really interesting, and it's great to hear someone with first-hand knowledge of these places," said Lance Schwulst, junior in pre-design professions.

"He was great. He is an awesome individual," said Stacey Liles, senior in architecture. "We get criticized everyday, and it was refreshing to get someone else's perspective who wasn't necessarily as harsh."

Liles said all problems Taylor had pointed out were obvious mistakes that were made through the designers.

"I would have liked him to have critiqued my work but it wasn't one of the randomly selected projects," said Gary Wong, senior in architecture. "He was a nice person to talk to and was very informal. He encouraged us in a positive manner. For our first year, he thought we were pretty good."

ministration would be nearly impossible by then. Without authority to spend their allowances, government agencies would be forced to close down.

To avert such a crisis, Congress was expected to pass a stopgap bill that would allow agencies to continue operating at their current budget levels in the new fiscal year. House Majority Leader Jim Wright, said House action was possible by Tuesday.

Last-minute spending decisions have become commonplace in Congress, as lawmakers try to use the clock as leverage to obtain money for favored programs. However, this year is the largest bottleneck ever.

None of the 13 appropriations bills, covering the full range of government activities, has been enacted.

Homemakers 'gear' toward issues

By The Collegian Staff

The Kansas Homemakers Extension members are changing their image by becoming more involved with current trends and issues, said Bernis Parker, co-chairwoman of the 1986 Kansas Extension Homemakers Council.

About 500 members of the council will meet Wednesday and Thursday for their 35th annual conference in Manhattan.

Parker, who has not missed a state conference in the last 15 years, said she has seen a definite change in the attitudes of the members and the conference itself.

"Back then, programs were aimed at college days for women, with programs on food and clothing," Parker said. "Now we are geared toward more current trends and topics, such as business and management."

The programs and speeches, focusing on local extension programs, will take place mainly in McCain Auditorium and the Union, said Carol Smith, conference coordinator.

The theme for this year's extension homemakers conference will be "Progressive Homemakers: Challenge of Choice," which will coincide with Kansas' 125th anniversary and its progress, Parker said.

Some of the speakers will include Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, and Virginia Moxley, associate dean of the College of Human Ecology. The speakers will address issues concerning change and motivation in the '80s.

There will be a preconference seminar today with tours to McCall's Pattern Co. and the Kansas Wheat Commission.

The two-day conference will offer educational programs focusing on topics such as safety, housing and resource management. Some of the workshops offered include "Energy Saving Products, Let the Buyer Beware" and "Food Additives — Who Needs Them," Parker said.

The Kansas Extension Program has abut 25,000 members statewide. Parker said although the members have different backgrounds and occupations, the majority of them are women.

The conference takes place in a different city in Kansas each year. This year's conference is a preparation for the national conference in 1989, at which about 2,000 members are expected to meet in Manhattan.

K-State students in apparel and textile marketing finish the Apparel and Textile Marketing Career Day luncheon by modeling in a fashion show titled "Campus Success.

Fashion program attracts students

By TERESA TEMME
Staff Writer

The most important aspect of the Apparel and Textile Marketing Career Day is getting prospective students on campus, said Marlene McComas, instructor of clothing, textiles and interior design and coordinator of last Friday's event.

"That's what President (Jon) Wefald stresses...getting high-school students on the campus and exposed to what is available here," McComas said.

About 135 students representing 22 high schools attended the career day in the Union.

"The career day gives prospective high-school students an idea of what type of program is available at K-State in apparel and textile marketing," she said. "It also exposes them to the many careers that are offered in this option."

The career day involved an opening session in which an overview of the apparel and textile marketing program at K-State was given.

Liz Simpson, a K-State graduate in apparel and textile marketing and owner of a business in Columbus, presented one of the seminars.

During the luncheon, Connie Ulasewicz, the keynote speaker from Esprit De Corp of San Fransisco, gave a presentation focusing on the international aspect of the company.

Ulasewicz has worked for Esprit De Corp for five years and has specialized in international areas for the last two.

It is important to work for the company that is right, she said, rather than working for any company that comes along.

"Esprit did not pick me. I picked them," Ulasewicz said.

She gave a slide show demonstrating the importance of the employees in a company. She said many of the employees of the company are used in the Esprit ads.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean of the College of Human Ecology, agreed with Ulasewicz that "people are the essence of the industry."

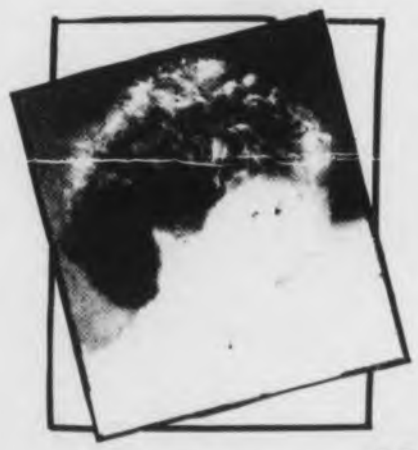
Opening the luncheon, Mary Don Peterson, associate professor of clothing, textiles and interior design, said the career day provided high-school students with the opportunity to learn more about the challenges offered in apparel and textile marketing. In addition, she said the program gave students a chance to see the "long-established K-State Department (of Clothing, Textiles and Interior Design)."

"Our graduates are active nationally and internationally in different facets of textile marketing," Peterson said.

Also during the luncheon, several K-State students in apparel and textile marketing modeled the latest styles in a fashion show titled "Campus Success."

Campus tours and an information table on admissions, financial aid and housing were provided during the afternoon.

Delores Currier, a teacher of gifted students from Ulysses, said the career day had been beneficial.



McComas said the Apparel and Textile Marketing class, which is offered by the Division of Continuing Education during the summer, is strictly for high-school students who are interested in the program.

The career day has been conducted every year, except last year, since 1981, McComas said.

Experts illustrate image projection

By DERON JOHNSON

For the businessman trying to project the right image, the staid pin-stripe navy suit, white shirt and red tie are no longer enough.

Today, he must create a total-image projection that will give him the edge in a fiercely competitive business world. But how many men are prepared to do everything necessary from skin analysis to developing the proper color harmony?

Not many, and that's the reason behind the creation of Total Image Consultants, a business division of Borck Brothers Menswear. Michelle McMillen, advertising creator for the company and temporary instructor of journalism, said the business will conduct its first workshops this fall.

"Clothing is only one of the many important elements in the workshops," McMillen said. "They're focusing on total image."

Other elements of image that will be addressed in the workshops are physical fitness, skin care, hair care and styling, wardrobe planning, communication skills and how to shop effectively for clothing.

McMillen said the workshop is for men only because they are less exposed than women to many of the important elements of image.

"Women have usually received more publicity in this area, so it's not as unique for women," she said. "At first, that's why it's being targeted at men."

However, she said, workshops planned for next spring will be available to women as well.

McMillen said for graduating men, the workshops may be particularly important because they need to project the proper image in the job interview.

"Professionalism is a big part of their image," she said. "They may lose out on a job because they don't know what they could know."

Presentations will be given by Van Brighton, director of the Workshop, and Fred Borck, president of Borck Brothers Menswear, Total Image Consultants business partners.

Brighton said the concept of image consulting is unique to this area of the country.

"Image consulting is big business on the East and West coasts right now and it's slowly filtering to our part of the country," he said. "Business now recognizes that the image of its personnel is almost more important than the product or service it sells."

Industry recognizes fashion choices few for large-size women

By PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Reporter

The fashion industry is getting bigger — and in more ways than one.

Being a large-size woman used to mean having very few fashion choices, but the fashion industry has recognized the need — and the market — for large-size fashions.

"Larger ladies were forever being forced to wear tacky polyester clothes," said Dena Nordlund, manager of Lots to Love, 1312 Westloop.

Lots to Love is a clothing store that caters to the large-size woman. Everything from silk to rayon and lamb's wool to linen is what their fashionably large clothes are made of, Nordlund said.

In addition to the Lots to Love shops, there are many other large woman's clothing stores throughout the state. Lane Bryant, Paris Plus, Catherine's, Maxies, Ample Duds, 16 Plus and Woman's World are just a few of the clothing stores for the large-size woman.

Besides the everyday clothing items such as dresses, blouses, slacks, blue jeans and sweaters, these shops offer the large woman seasonal items as well. For instance, bathing suits, evening wear and winter coats can be found at Lots to Love during various times of the year, Nordlund said.

"Black lace and red satin are no longer limited to the skinny woman," Nordlund said. "Fat women are sexy, too, and we have the lingerie to show that."

"We carry lacy little teddies, fanny wraps and long flowing negligees," Nordlund said.

A "large woman" is a term that does not apply just to a woman who weighs more than 150 pounds, she said.

"We get women in the shop who weigh 120 pounds with skinny little hips," Norlund said, "but they have a very large bust and need to buy their blouses from us."

It works the other way, too, she said. Women with large hips or thighs and a very small upper body — yet not weighing much — are regular shoppers at Lots to Love.

"We also cater to large-thighed men," Nordlund said. "Believe it or not, once in a while we get a man into the shop who needs jeans with a wider thigh cut. The large woman's Levi's 501 jeans provide this where the mens' 501 jeans don't."

These men aren't fat, she said. Rather,they are well-built with very muscular thighs.

What is fashionable for the small-size woman is fashionable for the large-size woman, Nordlund said.

The hot colors in fashion today are fuchsia, purple, turquoise, bright yellow and jade.

Skimps — long, loose blouses that hug the thighs at the bottom hem — are a popular Lots to Love item. Skimps, though, were first fashionable among the small-sized women, Nordlund said.

Leggins are another small-turned-large-size clothing item that is popular in the large woman fashion industry, Nordlund said. Leggins are slacks with stirrups attached that hug the leg all the way down, tapering to the ankle.

It used to be that large women could rarely find accessories and necessities, such as belts, strapless bras, girdles, exercise leotards and panty hose, Nordlund said. Today, however, these are common items in large women's clothing stores.

Manhattan's Lots to Love shop is one of a few dozen large-size women's clothing stores throughout the Midwest which are owned by the same family. Harris Brothers Inc. owns the Lots to Love chain of stores and is based in McCook, Neb. It's a family-run business dedicated solely to the large woman, Nordlund said.

Candice Vought is the manager of two Lots to Love shops in Colorado and buyer for 16 Harris Brothers' stores.

"We are trying to get away from the old ideas; that stripes must not go horizontally; that large-size ladies can only wear black, brown or navy; that blouses cannot be tucked into skirts and pants; that ensembles are not belted; that white should never be worn by large-size

For those students who don't like to strive for tailored perfection, this fall fashion season may leave them behind. That's because the buzzword for this fall is "dressy."

That's right: Pack up the jeans and Tees and say hello to pullover fleece jackets, denim skirts and camel hair top coats.

"The trend right now is for a neat, sharp look rather than just casual," said Jim Schottler, owner and manager of Casual Encounter, 1208 Moro St., primarily a men's store.

Schottler said the big-sellers in men's fashion revolve around the classic look. Sweaters, especially v-necks and those with vivid reds and bold blacks, are popular.

"Cardigans seem to be making a big move this year in sweaters," Schottler said.

Also, he said, wool slacks with checks and patterns are popular. In addition, this season's slacks feature a little fuller cut.

"That gives the athletes a better chance of wearing them, too," he said.

Rugby shirts, with or without collars, in wide stripes are good sellers this fall.

"They're real comfortable anyway," Schottler said. "I think people are looking for something that's comfortable and in style."

One of the victims of the new season seems to be the venerable blue jean.

"Blue jeans seem to not be the thing right now," Schottler said. "Traditional blue is not as in this year."

He said, however, jeans in colors are fashionable and so are denim jackets.

"Even in blue, they (the jackets) are still popular," he said.

Liisa Embree, manager of Scot's Ltd., 1223 Moro St., said she women are also avoiding the casual style, including jeans.

"They (women) are getting out of their jeans," she said. "We are selling a lot of skirts and a lot of dresses."

Embree said the big sellers in her store reflect the trend away from jeans in particular and away from casual styles in general.

"Everybody's sick of what they have in their closet," she said. "Everyone is tired of being so casual."

As a result, some of Embree's most popular items are the knit dress and skirts and dresses made of denim.

"The basic ideas that are going real well for us is anything in denim," she said. Even in the office, denim can be worn, Embree said.

"You have to really dress it up," she said. "(But) it's really acceptable in the workplace."

One of the ways to dress denim up is with the addition of scarves, which are selling phenomenally.

"This year it's just unreal," Embree said. "They've found out scarves aren't grandma things."

Other popular accessories are crocodile, snakeskin and alligator belts that range in width from 1½ to 3 inches and silver jewelry, which Embree said is still in vogue here, even though it has come and gone in other parts of the country.

"Dallas left silver behind early last summer," she said.

On the light side, Embree said Mickey Mouse apparel, which was strong last year, is still promising for the fall.

At Borck Bros., 1100 Westloop Place, Owner-Manager Alan Parker said his store's sales reflect an ivy league look among young men. Characteristic of this are brisk sales of sweaters, plaid shirts, pleated pants and all-cotton twill pants.

"You're seeing a trend back toward your natural fibers," Parker said.

Popular accessories include suspenders and silk pocket squares that complete a suit. Parker said he expects wool, cashmere and camel hair top coats to be good sellers this fall.

Parker has noted that the most popular size for men is no longer medium, but large.

"Large is by far the best (selling) size," he said.

"Denim is real big this year," she said. "Denim and lace is real strong."

In addition, suede and leather are breaking out of their traditional browns and today are as colorful as any other fabric.

"We're seeing opulent jewel tones and more contemporary colors," she said. "We call them opulent jewel tones because 'bright' reminds people of neon."

Mulch said her popular women's accessories this fall include belts, hearts, silver, large gold earrings, charm bracelets, pre-tied bow ties and scarves, which can be worn "anywhere."

Earl Allen, manager of Woody's Mens Store, 700 N. Manhattan Ave., said, "The main thing we're selling so far is plaid shirts, rugby shirts and brushed cotton corduroy pants."

Also, button-down Oxfords, ties splashed with paisley and stripes, tweed sport coats and suspenders are big sellers.

"That (suspenders) is probably one of the things a few years ago that we didn't sell too many of," Allen said.

He said the store's brushed cotton pants appeal is "for a guy who wants to be casual but wants more than a jean."

Formal wear creates new holiday looks using more glitter

By PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Reporter

Arriving with the fall and winter seasons are all the holiday get-togethers, cozy cocktail parties and the formal galas of Christmas and New Year's Eve. It's time to discard the deck shoes and Hawaiian shirts and put a little glamour and glitter into evening dressing.

This year's formal wear for men and women is characterized by sparkle, sophistication and romance, said Kris Emme, saleswoman for Christine's, 1100 Moro St. For women, the look is lace, sparkling silk and big accents.

Metallic fabrics and plush velvets are leading the way in formal wear, she said. Combining glittery silver or gold with black taffeta — puffed and strapless with a big bow for effect — is the glitz of the season.

"Velvets are in this year. The colors are jeweled — ruby, emerald, black and royal blue," Emme said. Also, rhinestones on dresses or worn as jewelry are popular this season. Sequins or bold lace are being used to top black, big-skirted gowns, she said.

The cut of the gowns is either very tightly fitted or bustle-like. The lengths range from mid-calf — called tea-length — on to the ankles, Emme said. Strapless gowns accented with a huge bow on the back or waist are definitely the look, she said.

The basic little black dress comes through again this season, but it's showy, yet sophisticated and romantic, Emme said.

Men have un-traditionalized the traditional black tuxedo by adding color to cummerbunds and bow ties. Men are replacing stale tuxedo gaberdine with new, lighter, shimmering fabrics, Emme said.

For men, the tuxedo is timeless in formal dressing. It is still the dressiest form of formal wear for men, Emme said. However, this season reflects new glamour for men.

The Dynasty Collection is a line of snazzy tuxedo styles which originates from the men's fashions worn on the show that inspired the line's name. This collection is truly the now look in formal wear for men, Emme said.

Black, gray and ivory tuxedos are shown in the collection. To accessorize the tuxedos, a real million-dollar look is created with printed cummerbunds of metallic, plaid or paisley fabrics that are popular this season, Emme said.

The tuxedos also have a more tailored look. Pleats at the waist of the pants are a new addition this year, as well as vests with a shawl collar, Emme said.

Bow ties around wing-tipped shirt collars are in. Ruffled or pastel formal shirts are out. Black metallic studs instead of buttons on shirts are in, Emme said. And double-breasted dinner jackets are out.

An exciting new look in this season's tuxedo is the appearance of a tiny bit of metallic shadow weave in the fabric, Emme said. It gives the overall look of the tuxedo an ever-so-subtle glittery appearance.

The women's formal wear at Christine's this season is priced between $110 and $130 for an elegant evening dress, Emme said. For men, though, the tuxedos can only be rented.

"Men rarely buy a tux," Emme said, "but women always are buying gowns."

Styles 'stepping out'

By PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Reporter

Like other clothing accessories, shoes make a fashion statement.

For this year's fall and winter seasons, men's and women's fashion footwear are breaking rules, setting trends and holding on to the classics.

Silver and gold shoes are worn with casual daytime outfits — not just with eveningwear. High-top athletic shoes show up for everyday dressing, not just for playing basketball. And formerly formal, black patent-leather shoes now go with office or school dressing.

These are just a few of the general rules of footwear fashion which are being "broken" this season.

For men this fall, there are a few footwear styles that are a step ahead of the others.

"The guys love the new red, black and white Air Jordan leather high-tops," for casual dressing, said Janell Hughbanks, saleswoman for McCall's Shoes, 313 Poyntz Ave.

Dottie Taylor, manager of Taylor's Shoes, 1118 Moro St., also said the soft leather high-top shoe is a standard item in many men's wardrobes. And the color? It's inevitably black, Taylor said.

A soft leather, snug-fitting shoe, resembling a wrestler's shoe, is popular with the men this season, Taylor said. The preferred colors of these shoes have been taupe, gray and black.

For a slightly dressier look, the season offers men a refined winter harachi in earth tones. Harachis are slip-on shoes of soft woven leather normally associated with summer wear. Also, the penny loafer remains a standard for the second season in the slightly dressy category for men, Hughbanks said.

For those evenings out on the town, men are going for the forever-in Oxford, but the color is a cordovan antique burgundy, said Jody Ellison, saleswoman for McCall's Shoes. A plain-toed Oxford wins out over any other kind of dress shoe for men, Taylor said.

For women this season, the most popular shoe style is the lace-up granny boots. Usually sporting pointed toes, the granny boots are most popular in black, winter white and taupe, Ellison said. These are worn for a slightly dressier look.

Running a close second behind the granny boot is the women's version of the men's wrestling shoe. These will be seen primarily in black — the color of the season — but are also appearing in red and winter white, she said.

Simple pumps and flats in gold or silver are a big item in women's fashion this season. They are being worn with everything casual, Ellison said.

There are similar trends in women's and men's footwear fashions this season. Exotic leathers such as snake, lizard, eel and crocodile can be found on Oxfords and pumps alike.

Ellison and Taylor agreed that if it's black, reaches to the ankle and is worn with virtually every outfit, then the hottest thing in footwear this season has just strolled right on by.

Nails, hair finalize fashion statement

By DERON JOHNSON
Features Editor

OK, you've gone shopping in the trendiest shops imaginable. You've spent the bulk of your last check on clothing and are you tres chic or what?

Not so fast. Tina Terhune wants your nails. And your hair.

Terhune, owner and manager of Studio 32, 3266 Kimball Ave., said the individual is not fashion-complete until nails and hair are considered. And, like articles of clothing, they are vital in composing the total fashion image.

This fall, nearly any hair style is acceptable.

"The top hair stylists in the nation get together and invent a new hair style for the season," Terhune said. "This season is very open. Everything goes."

She said the general trend for women this fall is more tailored.

"This year, it's more slick and controlled. The frame and face are real soft," she said.

Next spring, she predicts a rejuvenation of the classic Hollywood style for women.

"I think (the look) for next spring is really a soft wave off the face and pushed back. It's almost like the Marilyn Monroe look," Terhune said.

Carol Kohler, a hair stylist at Roffler Family Hair Center, 612 N. Manhattan Ave., agreed.

"Hair is a lot softer, a lot more romantic," she said. "It looks a lot more touchable."

Kohler said she has also noticed a popularity of styles reminiscent of the 1930s and '40s. She said the change in styles this year has been more drastic than the usual subtle changes.

"This year, we're going through a bigger change than we have been," Kohler said.

For men, the trend will stay fairly consistent with what is popular currently.

"Men's hair will be much shorter and (have) a more tailored look with some wave and texture," Terhune said.

Men, like women, are highlighting their hair.

"Men are willing to try something different, too," she said. "(But) they're not as daring as women are."

In addition to the hair, Terhune emphasized the importance of neat, manicured nails for both sexes. However, she has yet to convince a sizable portion of the Manhattan males that such treatment is completely necessary.

"When you talk to them, they say 'Yeah, that's a good idea.' (But) they feel awkward when they sit down (to have their nails done)." She said only about five men have come to her salon for nail treatment.

"I'm trying to promote my own male customers," she said. "I'm trying to educate them."

Like clothes and hair, nails also have fashion cycles. This fall, nails are short to medium length, oval with rounded edges and have deep, rich colors.

"Last year, nails were really long, like dragon nails," she said.

Popular services for nails are nail tips and sculpted nails.

Kohler said the process for sculpting nails is relatively simple.

"You have a (plastic, nail-shaped) form that goes over the nail," Kohler said. Then acrylic paints are added and the nail is ladies," she said.

Some of the biggest names in fashion have expanded their small-size designing to large-size designing, Nordlund said. Jordache, Sasson, Gloria Vanderbilt, Jantzen, Brittania and Vanity Fair are a few who have "gone big."

There are also entire clothing lines devoted solely to the large-size woman, Nordlund said. A few of these clothing lines are Big Beautiful Woman, Big Mama, Big Step Forward and Brylane.

Large women even have their own fashion magazine. Big Beautiful Woman is the first and only nationally distributed fashion magazine concerned with promoting the large-size woman as fashionable, said Editor Carole Shaw.

Shaw tells her readers to "stop feeling guilty about being a large-size woman and concentrate on being the beautiful and attractive person that you are, regardless of any size."

Terhune said manicures and pedicures cost between $10 and $15, while sculptures can cost as much as $50.

Another service which is new on the market is called a paraffin treatment. Terhune said the treatment is used for the face, hands and feet and helps to combat dry skin.

Reagan, Gorbachev agree to meet

Leaders to consider defense initiatives

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan and Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev, ending the diplomatic tug-of-war provoked by Moscow's arrest of an American journalist, agreed Tuesday to meet in Iceland in 10 days to resume the search for an arms control accord.

The surprise summit was arranged as part of a deal that brought the release Monday of Moscow correspondent Nicholas S. Daniloff and the expulsion Tuesday of accused Soviet spy Gennadiy Zakharov. Another element was a Soviet pledge to free Yuri Orlov, a prominent Soviet dissident exiled to Siberia, as well as Orlov's wife, next week.

Hinting at the carrot that lured him away from several apparently inflexible public positions taken in recent weeks, Reagan told reporters, "The chances are better than they've been for many years for reaching some agreement on arms reduction."

Secretary of State George P. Shultz said those chances include "reasonable prospects" for reducing medium-range missiles in Europe.

U.S. officials refused to call the Oct. 11-12 session between Reagan and Gorbachev a summit, and Shultz said the administration did not expect the talks to produce the signing of a new arms accord.

But Reagan told world financial leaders a short time later at the International Monetary Fund that the October session is intended "to prepare the ground for a productive summit."

Shultz said he still hopes a summit can take place later this year in the United States, as agreed to by Reagan and Gorbachev last year in Geneva. The one-on-one talks in Reykjavik, the secretary said, "will give a special push" to the various talks already going on at lower levels.

Shultz said the hurry-up meeting scheduled in less than two weeks in the capital of the tiny NATO island nation was proposed by Gorbachev in a letter delivered to Reagan on Sept. 19, which also contained the Soviet Union's latest bargaining position on proposed nuclear weapons reductions.

The two sides had been carrying on arms control discussions at various levels while trying separately to settle the case of Daniloff, whose arrest on what Reagan insisted were "trumped up" spy charges cast a pall over U.S.-Soviet relations and dimmed prospects for a summit this year.

Reagan insisted he would never trade Daniloff for Zakharov, who he said was caught red-handed trying to buy U.S. defense secrets for his government. But Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, in several hours of closed-door meetings in Washington and New York, worked out the package deal that gave both sides what they wanted most — with just enough face-saving provisions to enable both to claim victory.

Reagan, for instance, insisted Tuesday that "there was no connection" between Daniloff's release and Zakharov's expulsion.

Asked why that shouldn't be seen as the trade Reagan said he would never make, Shultz suggested it had something to do with the timing.

"Well, I think what we saw here was Daniloff released yesterday, and what I announced today was that Zakharov is being released from the United States and Orlov and his wife are being released from the Soviet Union," he said.

Overriding S. African veto may hurt U.S. negotiations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George P. Shultz told Republican senators Tuesday that a vote to override President Reagan's veto of South African sanctions would undercut Reagan's ability to negotiate with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

The White House, fighting to save the administration's policy of moving slowly on attempts to punish the white-minority government for its policy of apartheid, also announced that Reagan is naming career diplomat Edward J. Perkins, 58, to be the first black American ambassador to Pretoria.

Perkins has been serving as U.S. ambassador to Liberia. He would succeed Ambassador Herman W. Nickel in Pretoria when confirmed by the Senate.

Shultz's appeal for votes to sustain Reagan's veto of tough legislative sanctions against P.W. Botha's government, and the Perkins appointment, seemed to have been coupled with Reagan's offer Monday to issue new but limited sanctions against South Africa by executive order.

It all was part of a campaign by the administration to win the votes needed to sustain the veto in the Senate and stave off an embarrassing foreign policy defeat on Capitol Hill.

Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., convened the meeting with Shultz in his Capitol Hill office in the aftermath of the overwhelming 313-83 House vote Monday to override the Reagan veto.

"The president should obviously make every effort to sustain the veto," Dole told reporters. "The president is not going to give up on this easily."

"I asked my colleagues to hold their fire and give the president an opportunity to visit with them," Dole said. "I believe the veto ought to be sustained."

But in responding to questions, Dole said the battle remains an uphill one. "He may lose," Dole said of Reagan.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, one of the participants in the meeting, said Shultz made "a very strong pitch that the president's veto ought to be sustained" and clearly linked the override vote with the Reagan-Gorbachev meeting.

"I don't think he found too sympathetic an ear from the nine to 10 of us who were present," Grassley said.

Former employee faces theft charges

From staff and wire reports

TOPEKA — A former employee of the K-State Department of Extension Forestry was charged Tuesday in Riley County District Court with theft and making false documents in connection with the sale of government-owned trucks.

The former employee, William J. Moyer, Manhattan, was released on a $15,000 recognizance bond set by Judge Jerry Mershon, according to a spokesman for the Riley County Police Department.

Moyer, who will be 44 years old Sunday, was charged with six counts of felony theft and 10 counts of making a false writing, stemming from the sale of surplus federal property in 1985 and earlier this year, according to a statement by Attorney General Robert T. Stephan.

Moyer was a state official in charge of preparing the paperwork for a federal program that offered federal surplus property, such as vehicles, to Kansas rural fire departments, the statement said.

Stephan, who filed the charges, alleged that Moyer prepared paperwork to allow him to convert property to his personal use and then to profit from the sale of the property.

Court documents filed in the case listed five vehicles Moyer is charged with converting to his own use — ranging from a 1952 five-ton wrecker to a 1977 three-quarter ton pickup truck. In addition, Stephan charged

Candidates debate election procedures

By JENNY CHAULK
Collegian Reporter

Candidates for Kansas' secretary of state squared off in Manhattan Tuesday in their first one-on-one discussion of issues.

Bill Graves, R-Topeka, and Judy Runnels, D-Topeka, debated at Kennedy's Claim Restaurant, 2304 Stagg Hill Road. About 50 people attended the luncheon debate sponsored by the League of Women Voters of Manhattan and Riley County.

Issues addressed included handicapped accessibility to polling places, the merits of open vs. closed primary elections, voter registration issues on standardized voter registration and registration at the polls, mail-in ballots and the closing of voter registration books before elections.

Graves said the issue of handicapped accessibility is one that has become virtually moot.

"There was a federal law passed recently that mandates that states bring all their polling places into accessibility standards," Graves said. "Polling places in Kansas are 97-percent accessible now, and by Nov. 4, all polling places will be accessible."

Runnels said as far as accessibility is concerned, "the secretary of state has done a good job."

On the topic of voter registration books being closed 20 days prior to an election, Runnels said extending the time is very unpopular with county clerks. County clerks are responsible for keeping voting registration and records in order.

Graves said, "It is vital to the administration of fair and safe elections that they have time to get the poll books put together and see that everyone is properly registered."

Both candidates strongly support the use of mail-in ballots.

"We've found the use of the mail ballot to be extremely successful," Graves said. "The lowest voter participation in a mail ballot election since it began was about 60 percent."

Graves said the ballot is primarily used for non-candidate and non-partisan issues. He said he would encourage county clerks who don't use mail-in ballots to put them into effect when appropriate.

Runnels said mail-in ballots are cost-effective.

"If you look at what it costs for a special election, such as a sewer district or a school board election or some sort of bond issue, it costs a whole lot to set up a polling place and pay everybody to staff it, and there might be 10- to 20-percent voter turnout," Runnels said.

"With the mail ballot, there is the cost of the printing, stamps and maybe hiring an extra staff person," she said. "It's way less expensive. We get voter turnout from 60- to 80-percent, and I'm all for it."

Another topic the candidates addressed was the merits of open vs. closed primaries.

Runnels said about 40 percent of Kansas voters are registered independents. She said these voters "feel that they have been somewhat disenfranchised. In order for them to vote, they have to declare a party to vote for individuals. I am willing to investigate letting those who are registered as independents vote in the primary of their choice."

Graves disagreed with Runnels.

"The problem with the primary election is a case of people not understanding that the primary election is held as a way to nominate the candidates who will represent their parties. That's why it is closed to (on-

KSU Police find abuse in ticket appeals cases; board member resigns

By CANDY LEONARD
Collegian Reporter

Abuse of power by former Traffic Appeals Board members has prompted David Ott, attorney general of the Judicial Council, to work on legislation that would prohibit board members from handling personal ticket appeals and those of their friends.

Student Senate recently appointed two new students to fill vacancies on the five-person board.

One position was opened by the resignation of the student after the K-State Police discovered 12 personal ticket appeals were approved by the former board. The other position became vacant when the student appointed to this year's board did not return to school.

Last year's Traffic Appeals Board consisted of Susan Sommers, Andrew Talge, Dan Stock, George Heid and Scott Higgason.

"Seeing that temptations may arise, we're intending to change the way appeals of the Traffic Appeals Board members and their friends are handled," said Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics. "Possibly, these types of appeals will be deferred to our Judicial Council."

Judicial Council is an appointed body of the Student Governing Association that determines whether student cases will be heard by Tribunal, a seven-member board consisting of students and faculty.

Specific changes in policy are still being evaluated to determine the best way to avoid a conflict of interest by board members, Ott said.

Suspicions were first brought to the attention of Charles A. Beckom, KSU Police chief, last April. In a letter to Earl Nolting, former dean of students, Beckom said he had "serious reservations as to the basis and integrity of the board's actions in dealing with its own members and perhaps those known to the board."

The issue was immediately referred to student government officials. Their decision was to terminate the student government offices held by Sommers and Talge, former chairman and member of the Traffic Appeals Board.

Sommers, junior in apparel design, was serving as administrative assistant to the student body president. Talge, senior in finance, had been new chairman of

Rebel army commander captured

MANILA, Philippines — Military intelligence agents arrested the commander of the communist rebel army, and an insurgent spokesman said Tuesday that peace talks with the government may be doomed unless he is freed.

Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile said he would oppose any effort to release the prisoner, Rodolfo Salas. Enrile has said repeatedly that he doubts rebel sincerity in negotiating with President Corazon Aquino's government and believes they are buying time to increase their strength.

A Defense Ministry statement said intelligence agents caught Salas, 39, his wife and driver Monday night in front of a Manila hospital where he had undergone a medical checkup after surgery last week to remove a goiter.

It identified Salas, also known as Commander Bilog, as chairman of the military commission of the Communist Party of the Philippines.

Armed forces spokesman Gen. Luis San Andres said that made him commander of the New People's Army, which began the insurgency in 1969 against the government of Ferdinand E. Marcos. The former president fled the country last February.

No charges were specified against Salas.

FAA investigates plane accident

LIBERAL — Two investigators from the Federal Aviation Administration and one from the National Transportation Safety Board were trying to determine Tuesday what caused an FAA plane to slide off the runway at Liberal Municipal Airport.

The four FAA officials aboard escaped injury Monday when the two-engine Rockwell Saberliner jet crashed through a fence about noon and came to rest on the municipally owned Willow Tree golf course.

No one was on the course, which was scheduled to open at 1 p.m.

"It was a good thing there wasn't anybody out there at the time," said Skinny Carter, the golf pro at the course.

Carter said the FAA asked him to close the course. The plane was still there Tuesday, and Carter said he did not know when the course would reopen. He said three fairways and several trees were damaged.

The people on board the plane were identified as pilots Vincent A. Visconti, 31, and Ray Payne, 38, both of of Oklahoma City, and two other FAA officials, Jerry Hastings, 51, of Shawnee, Okla., and Coy Abrams, 54, of Oklahoma City. Visconti was reported to have been flying the plane at the time.

Congress sets $292 billion budget

WASHINGTON — House and Senate negotiators agreed Tuesday to authorize the Pentagon to spend almost $292 billion in the new fiscal year and also decided to keep alive a controversial Air Force trainer plane, congressional sources said.

The decisions came as a House-Senate conference committee worked in closed session to write a compromise bill authorizing the defense budget for the fiscal year that begins Wednesday, said the sources, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The conferees agreed on a Pentagon budget of $291.1 billion, a figure midway between the $295 authorized by the Republican-controlled Senate and the $287 total approved by the Democratic-run House, the sources said. The figure is far below the $320 billion originally sought by President Reagan for fiscal 1987.

The conferees also approved actual defense expenditures of $279 billion, a figure lower than the authorized total because authorization budgets include money that is expected to be spent in future years.

The two figures will be used by the House and Senate as they try to write the defense portion of a huge, catchall spending bill needed because none of 13 regular appropriations measures has been enacted by Congress.

Trade debt drops from record high

WASHINGTON — The U.S. trade deficit shrank dramatically to $13.3 billion in August after hitting a record high the month before, the government said Tuesday. Analysts said the 26.2 percent improvement may be signaling that the worst of the problems are over.

But in less optimistic news, the government reported that its chief economic forecasting gauge fell for the third time in the past four months and new-home sales suffered a fifth consecutive decline.

The various cross-currents are pointing to an economy that remains mired in lackluster growth with few signs of vigor, analysts contended.

While the trade improvement was seen as encouraging, economists cautioned it was not signaling that exports and imports were headed back into balance anytime soon. Analysts predicted the deficit for this year will top $170 billion, far ahead of last year's $148.5 billion record.

Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said the bulge in the trade deficit in the first half of this year came in part from higher prices of imports, reflecting the decline in the value of the dollar. As those prices deter sales in this country, the deficit will show improvement, he said.

"The sharp improvement from July to August may be the turning point in our trade deficit," Baldrige said in a statement. The administration is counting on improved trade to help boost economic growth in the second half of the year.

Travis, task force to discuss fee

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Department of Intercollegiate Athletics Director Larry Travis will answer questions about a proposed student athletic fee next week in the Union.

At the Athletic Fee Task Force meeting Tuesday night, Mike Jones, business manager for the athletic department, said Travis had "penciled in" the task force meeting on his schedule for next Tuesday.

At a previous meeting, task force members questioned whether the athletic department had officially requested a student athletic fee.

Jones said the best way to find out was to ask Travis.

"At one university Larry (Travis) worked at, each student paid $100 a semester for an athletic fee," Jones said. He added that Iowa State generates "a little over $1.2 million from an athletic fee."

The $1.2 million may not have all been profit, he said, because many universities that have athletic fees give the students free tickets to the games.

Jones stressed that K-State isn't the only university with financial problems plaguing its athletic department.

"The University of Missouri's athletic department lost $1.5 million last year, and the university picked it up," he said.

One of the first steps in raising more money is to get more people in the stands, Jones said.

He said the athletic department budgeted for 7,000 student tickets for the football season and has sold around 5,500.

"Our location is the killer," he said about low ticket sales. "Any other team in the Big Eight has a metro area next door."

When asked how badly the athletic department needed a student athletic fee, Jones simply said, "We could use it."

"I think Oklahoma is the only other (university) in the Big Eight that doesn't have an athletic fee," he said.

As an ex-officio member of the task force, Jones said his purpose is "to provide the group with information from the athletic department."

At Tuesday night's meeting, he also provided the group with graphs from the athletic department comparing different universities' athletic fees and ticket costs. A graph of the Big Eight athletic budgets showed K-State's to be the lowest in the conference.

Task force member Becky Svaty, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, said she had talked to a few K-State coaches about their views on a student athletic fee.

"The coaches' concerns were that, if there is a fee, the fee will go to where the students say it should go," she said.

The task force meets every Tuesday at 5:30 p.m.

Wastewater violation results in $1,000 fine

By The Collegian Staff

The Department of Animal Science and Industry has been fined $1,000 for wastewater treatment violations following a complaint filed by the Riley County Health Department.

Don Good, department head, said the Kansas Department of Health and Environment office in Topeka levied the fine because of improper handling of wastewater, which caused the wastewater to flow down a grass waterway.

The wastewater flow from the waterway runs to a creek and eventually to the Blue River.

Good said a dike had been placed across a sewer lagoon near the K-State dairy research facility to allow bulldozers to work on an expansion project in the north end of the lagoon.

He said that heavy rains caused a threat of overflow from the southern half, and the violation occurred when an employee intentionally started pumps to prevent an overflow into the northern half.

State law, Good said, would allow the overflow to run into the waterway if it was caused by natural overflow and proper authorities notified within three days.

"It was our fault," Good said, adding that the employee was not familiar with the legality of runover.

"It will not happen again," he said. "It was an error."

Good also said employees are being trained to prevent the situation from occurring again.

"The person thought he was doing something right," Good said.

According to The Associated Press, the department is required to submit a plan to KDHE by early November outlining steps to be implemented to prevent any further violations.

Daniloff release result of package deal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration, unwrapping the package deal that sprang Nicholas S. Daniloff and spared an accused Soviet spy a trial, proclaimed Tuesday the United States triumphed in the showdown of superpowers.

The month-long negotiations also culminated in the easing of a U.S. order expelling Soviet diplomats from the U.N. mission in New York and a Kremlin decision to permit the emigration of prominent Soviet dissident Yuri Orlov, and his wife.

President Reagan, who had insisted all along that Gennadiy Zakharov, the Soviet scientist accused of spying, would not be traded for Daniloff, told reporters in a jammed White House briefing room: "There was no connection between the two releases."

Only a few minutes earlier, Zakharov was allowed to plead no contest to the spy charges in a federal court in Brooklyn with a U.S. guarantee that he would be swiftly expelled.

Daniloff, the 51-year-old reporter for U.S. News & World Report, arrived at Washington-Dulles International Airport at Chantilly, Va., late Tuesday afternoon, waved to a group of well-wishers and, accompanied by his wife Ruth, got in a van for a short ride to the terminal.

Once there, Daniloff was reunited with his daughter, Miranda, 23, and son Caleb, 16, and a host of friends and associates. Miranda clutched a batch of yellow roses as she hugged her father. The group shared a champagne toast.

"What can I say?" Daniloff asked. "I'm overwhelmed. Well, I'm awfully glad it's all over. I never knew what was going to happen next."

Daniloff and his family were invited to meet with Reagan Wednesday at the White House.

Daniloff had been held in a Soviet prison for 13 days, and then confined to the American Embassy for 17 more days, on charges of committing espionage against the Soviet Union, before being allowed to leave Monday.

Daniloff had protested his innocence, and Reagan had vouched for the veteran American journalist in a letter the president sent to Soviet General Secretary Mikhail S. Gorbachev.

Appearing in the same briefing room with Reagan, Secretary of State George P. Shultz said, "I think you have to look at all of these things as a package."

But, Shultz also exulted, "Overall, it's been a pretty good week for us."

The only reservation was expressed by Reagan, who took a few questions after popping into the room unexpectedly to announce he would meet with Gorbachev in Reykjavik, Iceland, in 12 days.

Officials responsible for informing citizens

When Nicholas Daniloff and Gennadiy Zakharov were simultaneously released to their respective embassies, President Reagan said the decision was not a deal but an "arrangement."

Apparently another arranged coincidence has taken place. Daniloff was released Monday and allowed to return to the United States Tuesday. Zakharov also began his journey home Tuesday.

The difference between the cases is that Daniloff was "expelled," according to Tass, the official Soviet news agency, and Zakharov was asked to "deport" by U.S. officials. As an additional prize, Secretary of State George P. Shultz said the Soviets will also release Yuri Orlov, a prominent Soviet dissident described by Shultz as the "driving force" behind a civil rights activist group.

Was America surprised to see the "swap" after Reagan announced a trade-off between Daniloff and Zakharov wouldn't take place?

Many reporters and professors postulated that the prisoners' release would end up in a trade-off, but why were they forced to hypothesize?

Why did meetings between Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze persist when many U.S. officials were against any U.S.-Soviet relations while Daniloff was in custody?

After those meetings occurred, why were questions continually ignored as Shultz reiterated the ambiguous answer of "We're working on it?"

Reagan is eager to negotiate arms-control with Mikhail Gorbachov, even more so than he was to defend an innocent U.S. citizen. During the entire Daniloff episode, the Reagan administration treated the Kremlin with more respect than it did its own country.

Democracy is defined as "government by the people, directly or through representatives." By negotiating Daniloff's release without telling citizens how and why, the administration has failed to uphold its duty to the people of the United States.

Constitution revision needs further change

Even if the Student Senate constitutional revision on student representation is approved by the college councils, inequities in representation for part-time students will exist.

The amendment calls for one senator for every 300 full-time students, but part-time students will only get one senator for every 600. In other words, they count half as much as full-time students. However, this is an improvement from current representation that completely neglects part-time students.

The reason part-time and full-time students aren't considered equal for representation is the reasoning that if students are part-time, they do not utilize and contribute to the University as much as full-time students. Therefore, they don't need their concerns voiced equally.

The same logic is used in deciding the student activity fee. Students enrolled in six hours or less pay half the fee. Again, the reason is that part-time students use the University half as much as full-time students.

The University needs to keep in mind that part-time students should be entitled to the same rights and privileges as full-time students. How much a person uses the University and contributes to it is up to the individual, not the number of hours in which he is enrolled.

Giving part-time students full representation in Student Senate would allow fairness and equity in addressing their concerns and interests. However, carrying the full load of the activity fee should also be a requirement and responsibility to increased representation. If a student doesn't take advantage of the opportunity to express himself through student government or to make use of services provided by the activity fee, then it is his loss. It should never be because he isn't being treated equally in student government or any part of the University.

Beef checkoff to help industry's promotion

Rather than idly waiting for government subsidies or economic upturn, cattlemen nationwide are uniting to improve their situation.

Beginning today, every time a head of cattle is sold, the seller will chip in $1 that will go into a fund for promotion of the red-meat industry.

In Kansas, the measure replaces a voluntary 25-cent donation per animal sold. The 25-cent checkoff raised $950,000 to $980,000 a year for the state. The mandatory $1 checkoff should generate $6.5 million annually in the state.

As the nation's largest beef-packing state, Kansas will benefit enormously from the effort. The industry produces $3 billion a year in cash receipts and $1.6 billion in cattle.

In recent years, the red-meat industry has been overshadowed by an increasingly popular poultry industry. With funding for promotion, the industry could improve packaging, hire a celebrity spokesperson, increase research and distribute nutritional information.

Although cattlemen admit the dollar checkoff is a financial burden, they are willing to make the sacrifice to bring about a better future.

U.S. should appreciate free choice

SUSAN BAIRD
Collegian Columnist

The right to choose is a freedom taken for granted in the 1980s. This right is often realized only after overcoming hardship. Interviews conducted with former slaves during the 1930s demonstrate this point.

While interviewing emancipated slaves, historians discovered that not all of them placed high value on the right of choice. In the book "Roll, Jordan, Roll," Eugene D. Genovese gave several examples from narratives of former slaves who preferred the years of captivity in the antebellum South even though they were denied the right to choose.

"I was born in slavery and I think them days was better for the niggers than the days we see now," said former slave Andrew Goodman, at the age of 97 years.

"One thing was, I never was cold and hungry when my old master lived, and I has been plenty hungry and cold a lot of times since he is gone...,' he said. "(The slaves cried when told they were free) 'cause they don't know where to go, and they's always 'pend on old Marse to look after them."

According to these narratives, former slaves thought the master had the responsibility of providing for their basic needs. They didn't have to make choices about obtaining food, clothing and housing. Following their emancipation, a few blacks found they were not prepared to make these choices and earn a livelihood.

"To tell de truth, de fact of de business is, my marster took care of me better'n I can take care of myself now," said Henri Necaise, a former slave in Mississippi.

"When us was slaves Marster tell us what to do. He say, 'Henri, do dis, do dat.' And us done it," he said. "Den us didn't have to think where de next meal comin' from, or de next pair of shoes or pants. De grub and clothes give us was better'n I ever gets now."

Before accepting these statements, a person must consider them in the context of the blacks' experiences as slaves and as free men. After emancipating the slaves, the federal government failed to provide freed blacks with farmland or adequate training to earn a livelihood.

Moreover, many of the former slaves interviewed for the slave narratives had been children in the antebellum South. Consequently, they had not felt the full weight of the overseer's whip on their backs as had a field hand or a house servant.

In addition, historians conducted the interviews during the height of the Great Depression. A slave's master was responsible for taking care of the young and old alike. From the perspective of some former slaves still living in the 1930s, they were not being as well cared for as they had been as slaves.

After coping with the problems accompanying their freedom, the majority of blacks preferred freedom to slavery. One woman said she told Yankee soldiers she would not hurt her master and mistress because she loved them. Yet, she valued her freedom more highly.

"I felt like it be Heaven here on earth to git freedom," said former slave Green Cumby of Texas, "'spite de fac' I allus had de good marster. He sho' was good to us, but you knows dat ain't de same as bein' free."

One Southern woman told of a former slave who had become wealthy after his emancipation. Even though his son spent all of his money leaving him poverty stricken, the old man said he was happier a free man than a slave. With freedom had come much suffering, but he had been free to choose the responsibilities that brought it.

These Americans appreciated the freedom to make decisions about their life. Although Southern states passed laws that in one form or another curtailed blacks' rights, former slaves still had something they'd never had before — the right to choose.

In this age of civil rights, it is difficult for Americans to appreciate the right to choose. We take so much of our freedom for granted that we forget that citizens of some countries don't have a constitution protecting their rights.

They have no choice between candidates on the election ballot because the official party sponsors only one candidate. People can only choose from the clothing the government decides to make available. Government censor boards limit the choice of reading material.

The right to choose what you want to do with your life is considered a fundamental right in the United States, but not all governments give their people this right.

Whenever you have to make a choice, be thankful that you can.

Thanks unwarranted

Editor,

Re: The advertisement, "A Million Thanks to the Students of Kansas State...," by the Coliseum Program Committee in Thursday's Collegian.

What is this propaganda I see in the Collegian by the Coliseum Program Committee? I found this attempt at "whitewashing" to be crude and tactless, and clearly demonstrates the committee's lack of consideration of the generally negative responses they have received from those who have spoken out against the coliseum.

I, as well as others at K-State, have had very serious doubts about this project, and to include us, per se, as being "committed" to this, is a gross misrepresentation of the actual feelings we have toward the coliseum.

In the future, the committee should confine its thank you's to those individuals who fully supported the coliseum project. Perhaps a list of those who actually supported this should be published in the Collegian to let everyone know who is really responsible for bringing this project to reality. After all, let's give "credit" where credit is due.

Departments omitted

Editor,

Re: The article, "Local businesses host 'After Hours' events" in Thursday's Collegian.

After reading the article, I felt it was important to clarify the scope of the College of Human Ecology for both the Collegian reporter and her readers.

While the departments of dietetics, restaurant and institutional management, and foods and nutrition are important parts of the human ecology college, the departments of human development and family studies, and clothing, textiles and interior design are also integral parts of this college's program. While they were not mentioned in the article, both were represented by students and faculty at Wednesday nights's "After Hours" program.

If the Collegian is going to report important campus and community events, I believe it is their responsibility to do so in a comprehensive fashion. Omitting coverage of the contributions of two of the college's four departments to the "After Hours" programs portrays a limited and inaccurate view of the scope of this event and the support given to it by students and faculty alike.

Comparison wrong

Editor,

Re: the editorial, "City should welcome KANU radio services," in Thursday's Collegian.

Again, another example of a Collegian editorial that was not well researched. I find that comparing KANU and KSDB is like comparing apples to oranges, or the Collegian to the Kansas City Times. I realize KANU is very professional and quite "consistent," but KANU can be what they want to be with their substantial operating budget.

Let me draw some comparisons between KANU and KSDB. KSDB has a yearly budget of about $12,000 that is allocated by Student Senate. KANU has a total budget of around $1 million that comes from federal, state and private funds. KSDB is staffed by 40-50 students and volunteers who receive no pay. KANU has full-time, state-paid professionals on staff. KANU employs just 15 graduate students who receive slightly more than minimum wage. KSDB is a 125-watt station while KANU has 110,000 watts.

But KSDB programs to Manhattan and K-State, while KANU programs for people living in the eastern part of the state. KSDB gives the listeners of Manhattan and K-State programs geared toward local interests, not generic programming for half a state. KANU will not (and has not) broadcast Landon Lectures, convocations, special speakers and special events of Manhattan, but KSDB has and plans to do even more in the future.

KSDB's mission is to provide students the opportunity to develop skills needed in the professional world, just like the Collegian, and provide programming not offered by other stations in the community. So, we are going to make mistakes, just like the Collegian.

Please don't get me wrong, I welcome KANU to Manhattan. KANU has plenty to offer. KSDB also has a lot to offer. KSDB wants to get better, but in the context of an educational experience for both the student and the audience. KSDB supports K-State and Manhattan through countless hours of public service announcements, special broadcasts of music, news and sports and events that promote the area. All we ask is that Manhattan and the University support KSDB.

Cattlemen unite, donate dollars to promote meat industry

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Cattlemen across the nation begin Wednesday building a beef promotion war chest by chipping in $1 per head of stock sold, with plans calling for some of the money to be used to finance a major multimedia advertising blitz designed to create more demand for beef.

The $1 per head, called a checkoff, will be collected each time a live beef animal changes hands, with the exception of sales involving agents who get only a commission or fee for their efforts.

The mandatory assessment replaces a voluntary 25-cent per head checkoff that had been in place in Kansas.

"One dollar represents a minute percentage of a steer's total value, but a major step forward in the area of promoting our product to consumers," said Dan Bird, chairman of the Kansas Beef Council and an Anthony cattleman.

Under the voluntary set-up, the KBC collected about $950,00 to $980,000 a year, said Rene Wassenberg, KBC executive director. Of that amount, $300,000 was retained for state projects. The rest was sent to the Beef Industry Council of the National Livestock and Meat Board for national promotional and research efforts.

The mandatory checkoff should bring in about $6.5 million in Kansas, Wassenberg said. The KBC has committed to send at least 80 percent of the receipts to a national fund that will be administered by the newly formed Cattlemen's Beef Promotion and Research Board.

Potential nationwide collections under the mandatory checkoff are estimated at $60 million to $70 million a year.

"That's six to seven times more than we've ever spent on advertising," said Tom McDermott of the National Meat and Livestock Board.

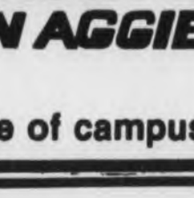
Much is at stake for producers in Kansas, the nation's top beef-packing state. There are approximately 6 million head of cattle in the state. The industry produces $3 billion a year in cash receipts and $1.6 billion in cattle. It is easily the state's largest agriculture-related business, according to Kansas Agricultural Statistics Service reports.

Current beef advertising, promotion and research efforts are so terribly underfunded they are ineffective, said Virgil Huseman, a 40-year-old cow-calf operator who lives near Ellsworth, west of Salina. He's a member of the operating committee of the Cattlemen's Beef Promotion and Research Board.

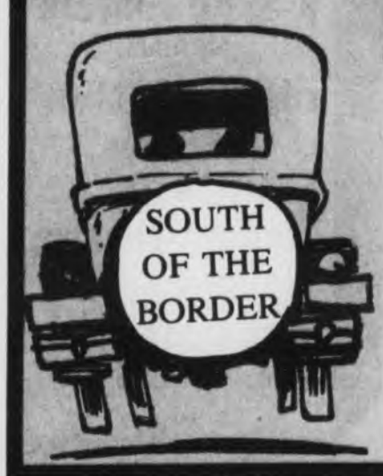
"Nobody, me included, wants to pay a dollar," Huseman said. "We need every dollar that we can get. But there's a problem and there's a need."

Huseman and other cattlemen recognize red meats are continuing to lose sales to poultry.

"I believe that's something we can do something about. And believe me nobody else is going to do it for us."



The Kansas Livestock Association didn't immediately warm to the idea of a mandatory checkoff when the National Cattlemen's Association began lobbying for its inclusion in the 1985 farm bill.



Then-NCA President Jo Ann Smith and NCA executives turned the KLA around and won its support. Part of their ammunition was a 1985 survey of cattlemen that showed 92 percent favored industry-funded promotional efforts.

In about 18 months cattlemen will vote in a referendum that will decide whether the mandatory checkoff will continue.

Debate

ly) members of those respective parties," Graves said. "I'm in favor of leaving primaries closed because I think the two-party system is the strength of our nation."

Graves' main priority, if elected, will be voter education.

"We have a problem of people not understanding how our system works, how you get registered, where you go to register and what the issues are," Graves said. "My priority would be to get around the state and talk to people about the importance of being involved.

"We need to get people's adrenalin flowing and get people interested in the electoral process in this state, because it has been said if you don't get involved in government, it starts doing things to you instead of for you."

Runnels' first priority would be to implement a sample or explanatory ballot. The ballot would be sent to all registered voters about two weeks before an election. It would contain candidate information, explanations of amendments and comments from proponents and opponents of those amendments.

"You can sit in the privacy of your living room and become an informed voter, so that when you go to the polls, you know what you are voting on," Runnels said.

Runnels said that explanatory ballots would ensure educated voting, but Graves questioned the actual effect that these ballots would have on voters.

"I have problems with this, given all the avenues that are available to people to be educated, such as radio, newspapers, TV and word of mouth," Graves said. "If you want to learn about a candidate or an issue, there's not a person who can tell me that there are not avenues available to them to learn what they need to know to cast a vote."

Runnels said she is qualified to be secretary of state because of her experience in politics. She was a lobbyist for the Kansas State Nurses Association for seven years, a legislative liaison in the governor's office for two years and served as a state representative from the 56th District for the past four years.

"We need a fresh new approach," Runnels said. "We have had an incumbent in the office of the secretary of state since 1951. It's time we had someone new in there who's going to get out and work hard. I think I'm the person for the job."

Moyer with converting a lift machine to his own use.

After the statement was distributed at the Capitol, a spokesman for Stephan, Neil Woerman, said the attorney general filed the charges at the request of Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy, who had an unspecified "conflict" in the case.

Kennedy, contacted at his home Tuesday night, said he asked the attorney general's office to step in because he is a neighbor and friend of Moyer.

"It was a no-win situation," Kennedy said.

He also said he appointed Assistant County Attorney Greg Kieffer to handle the case, but when the scope of the case was detected, Kennedy contacted the attorney general's office.

Kennedy said it also made more sense for the prosecution to be handled by Stephan's office because of the large number of counties involved.

Jay Schultz, head of the Department of Forestry, said Moyer left the department last June.

Oktoberfest a fall feast

Costumes courtesy of Marie's Costume Shop

Every October, the stomachs of many Americans — no matter what their nationalities — become just a little partial to the Germans.

October is the time when a centuries-old tradition prompts a celebration and, most of all, an indulgence in a wealth of food.

This is Oktoberfest.

Celebrators who attend Oktoberfest are treated to the smell and taste of hot, marinated sauerbraten, bratwurst, warm German potato salad, sauerkraut with onions and apples and, of course, German beer.

Oktoberfest has been a German tradition for more than 150 years. It originated in 1810 when Princess Therese of Saxe-Hildburghausen married Bavaria's Crown Prince Ludwig I.

For a wedding celebration, a horse race was held, and 40,000 Bavarians came to Germany to observe the race and celebrate the wedding of the prince and princess. The celebration following the horse race was so successful it was decided the festival be repeated every year.

In addition, Oktoberfest has traditionally been a time to celebrate the completion of bountiful harvests.

One of the major American celebrations of Oktoberfest is held each year in Hot Springs, Ark. The city expects several thousand people to converge on the town again this year, said Bill Maddox, manager of special events for the Hot Springs Chamber of Commerce.

Maddox said organizers prepare many foods for the event, including smothered chopped sirloin with onion sauce, fried fish filet with sauce, bratwurst with sauerkraut, warm potato salad, boiled potatoes in jackets, young vegetables, many salads — including macaroni, red beet, kidney bean and sauerkraut — and various breads.

Erica Phelps, a native of Germany who now resides in Hot Springs, described some of the cooking methods for the many Oktoberfest foods. Phelps, who came to live in the United States in 1974, said the food prepared at the American festivals is similar to that in Germany.

Americans try to come as close as possible to preparing authentic German food, she said, and often the only differences are in spices or flavorings on the food.

Phelps said that for meat products, she often browns the meat in oil in a heavy dutch oven with salt and pepper, and then adds other spices and flavoring, if necessary. Often, the Germans add beer, wine or cognac to the meat to give it more flavor, she said.

For sauerbraten — a meat that is often marinated for three or four days — Phelps adds a sauce or gravy with sweet or sour cream and homemade noodles. However, she said it was difficult to buy the ingredients for the homemade noodles in the United States.

The warm potato salad, or German potato salad, is distinctly different from the American version because the potatoes are boiled with their jackets on and peeled warm, Phelps said. Sauteed onions and bacon can be added, in addition to chicken or beef broth. The American version of potato salad is served cold and contains mayonnaise instead of broth.

German breads also are an important part of the array of Oktoberfest foods, Phelps said. Many of the breads are wholesome rye and dark breads, such as pumpernickel.

The Germans also eat a white bread that is similar to French bread. In addition, Germans make a lot of hard rolls, some made of pretzel dough sprinkled with salt and topped with butter.

Another famous German food that often accompanies the many forms of sausages is sauerkraut. Phelps said she prepares her sauerkraut by draining and washing the cabbage and cooking it with margarine, sauteed onions and apples. She then adds some sugar to sweeten it. Ham or bacon can also be used to add more variety and flavoring to the dish.

After eating several generous helpings of marinated sauerbraten, German potato salad, pumpernickel bread and sauerkraut, who could begin to think about eating a dessert? But Oktoberfest desserts are tempting, although they are usually not as sweet as American desserts, Phelps said.

Many of the desserts are made from a thin yeast dough that is rolled on a cookie sheet and covered with anything from apples and cream to raisins, she said. Another dessert can be made by using yeast dough rolled out with cream and sugar, then topped with raisins and nuts and rolled into shape.

A final touch to the Oktoberfest meal is German beer, which accompanies the main dish and dessert. Heinz Bulmahn, associate professor of modern languages, said large amounts of Wiesenbier, a particularly strong German beer, are consumed at the European Oktoberfest celebrations.

Bulmahn said Oktoberfest is a "wild beer party" to celebrate the end of harvests. Many times, in Germany it is too cold to have the festival in October, Buhlman said, so most of the event takes place during the latter part of September.

Oom-pah-pah: Fests to begin

By ANNE BRANDSBERG
Collegian Reporter

The sounds of oom-pah-pah fill the air. A little band, with an obligatory tuba and a small accordion, plays in the street, while apple cider and beer quench thirsts.

Weiner schnitzel and sauerkraut on hard rolls are devoured along with hot, soft pretzels.

Chilly, fall breezes carry the smell of smoldering leaves through the crowds gathered to shop, eat and enjoy the atmosphere.

Oktoberfest season is here. Cities and towns in Kansas are holding their traditional fall festivals this month, celebrating the German heritage of the members of the communities.

Manhattan's own Oktoberfest will happen Saturday in Aggieville from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Aggieville will be filled with food and craft booths, fire trucks and knife throwers, said Bill Jacoby of the Aggieville Merchants Association.

Saturday, 115 craft booths will be set up along the sidewalks between the 1100 and 1200 blocks of Moro Street. Picnic tables and food booths will be in the street.

"All kinds of food will be there — Mexican, pizza, Chinese, Cajun, barbecue and the traditional food, too. Aggie Station and Last Chance are having bratwurst, hot dogs and sauerkraut," Jacoby said.

The Kaw Valley Muzzle Loaders will be in Triangle Park (located at the intersection of Manhattan and Anderson avenues and Moro Street) from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. At 3, a wood festival will begin with several kinds of competition, including sawing, log climbing and chair making using stumps of wood, he said.

Jacoby said musical entertainment from 1 to 3 p.m. will be provided by the KSU Marching Band and a German band.

Manhattan will not be the only Kansas community hosting an Oktoberfest this weekend. Other festivals will be at Hays on Fiday, Wamego on Saturday, Atchison on Saturday and Sunday and Wichita on Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

The Kansas Expo Centre will be the location for Topeka's Oktoberfest on Oct. 18. Area Salina residents will be able to enjoy an Oktoberfest on Oct. 18-19.

Program offers non-traditional degrees

By KELLY KLOVER
Collegian Reporter

The Non-Traditional Study Program, offered through the Division of Continuing Education, allows residents in Kansas an opportunity to earn a bachelor's degree while off campus.

Also referred to as an external degree program, NTS is designed to accommodate students who are unable to be in Manhattan while completing a degree.

"We are trying to reach those students who have already run into some hardships and barriers," said Cynthia Trent, NTS coordinator and assistant specialist for continuing education academic outreach. It is difficult for people who have families and jobs to leave those things and live in Manhattan, she said.

About 90 students throughout Kansas are currently enrolled in NTS, which has been in existence for more than 10 years. To participate, a student must have completed a minimum of 60 credit hours from an accredited institution.

There is no age requirement, although most students are at least 25 and have been out of school from two to 20 years, Trent said. Students are allowed to complete courses at their own pace and are able to register for courses at any time. There is a $25 application fee, and course fees, set by the Board of Regents, are $42 per credit hour.

NTS students can earn credit several ways. The one program that makes NTS unique is Guided Studies. This program allows students to study and complete exams in the convenience of their own home.

About 23 classes are available through this program, which is offered only to NTS students. Introduction to Geology and Introduction to Philosophical Problems are two popular courses, Trent said.

Trent said NTS students must be self-directed individuals who are willing to assume great responsiblity.

"You kind of have to crack your own whip," she said. "It's probably one of the hardest ways to earn a degree."

Courses for NTS have been modified by the regular University instructors. Henry J. Camp, associate professor of sociology, anthropology and social work and coordinator of the undergraduate sociology program, has been involved with NTS for about seven years.

"I support the program wholeheartedly," he said. Camp, who teaches Urban Sociology, said he generally has two to three NTS students each semester.

Because there is no chance for classroom participation, Camp said he increases the number of exams given to the students. The exams are composed of essay questions and are open-book. His students also are required to conduct a research project that can be carried out in their own communities.

Students are getting a slightly different college degree, Trent said, "but they are also getting a very enriched one."

Anthony Wilcox, associate professor of physical education, dance and and leisure studies, said Concepts of Physical Education does not require a high level of modification. NTS students use the same book and packet as traditional students but are given a different exam based solely on text material, he said. The exam is sent to a nearby school or library where it is administered to the student.

Other ways students can earn off-campus credit are through correspondence courses from other institutions, Telecourses and Telenet Courses. Trent said two to four Telecourses are offered each semester.

Students are able to earn credit by watching these courses, which are aired over KTWU (Channel 11 in Topeka). Although students view the programs at home, they usually are required to meet four to six times on campus for discussion and exams.

Students also are able to take Telenet courses at 36 different locations throughout the state. Telenet classrooms have a public address system and microphones that allow two-way communication between instructors and students.

NTS students must have acquired a minimum of 30 semester hours, with 20 of the last 30 earned being from K-State. Most students earn the general degree in Interdisciplinary Social Science. However, with a variety of NTS courses, some students are able to qualify for other majors.

NTS student Paul Scroggs joined the program one year ago, needing about 37 hours to complete his degree. He plans to graduate in December with a bachelor of science in social studies and a minor in animal science.

Because Scroggs works for the government and travels nationwide 50 percent of the time, he found it impossible to complete his degree traditionally. He said he has moved several times during the past 20 years but has not found any other schools that offer a true, traditional program.

"I don't want a mail-order degree," he said. "I want a regular degree."

Scroggs has earned credit mainly through Guided Study and Telecourse programs. During vacation, however, he was able to come to campus to complete courses during intersession.

It generally takes two to six years for an NTS student to complete a bachelor's degree.

Ag leaders to reveal plans at association convention

By The Collegian Staff

The Kansas Farm Writers and Broadcasters Association is scheduled to hold its annual meeting today and Thursday at the Manhattan Holidome.

One highlight scheduled for the meeting is a press conference at 11 a.m. Thursday with Gov. John Carlin and Doyle Rahjes, president of Kansas Farm Bureau. Also set to participate in the press conference is Ivan Wyatt, president of Kansas Farm Union, and Jack Frick, president of the Kansas Livestock Association.

"A big announcement is expected during the press conference," said Becky Koch, communications director for the Kansas Wheat Commission. The governor and agricultural leaders are expected to endorse the land-use value amendment on the November ballot, Koch said.

The association's business meetings will also be conducted Thursday, with the meetings to be recessed for the press conference.

"This association is a fairly new one, so the business meetings will involve evaluation of the first year and goal setting for the upcoming years," Koch said.

A banquet is scheduled for tonight, followed by a free program, open to the general public, to begin at 7:45 p.m.

The program is to feature Ken Root, National Broadcast Association president, and Sam Brownback, the newly appointed state secretary of agriculture.

Educators' proposals anger coaches

Coaches say recommendations miss issues

By TIM FITZGERALD
Sports Editor

K-State football Coach Stan Parrish recognizes there are problems with college athletics, but he thinks recommendations being offered by a group of college presidents, aimed at helping college athletics, ignore the major problems with collegiate sports.

A 10-member panel from the American Council of Education offered a series of proposals last week aimed at reducing the expenses involved in operating major college athletic programs and placing more emphasis on the academic role of the student-athlete. Those recommendations include:

— Eliminating spring football practice.

— Reducing the number of scholarships schools can award in a three-year period from 90 to 80 in football and 15 to 12 in basketball.

— Delaying the start of basketball season by a month and reducing the number of games.

— Reducing the number of full-time assistant coaches from nine to seven in football and two to one in basketball.

— Cutting the off-campus recruiting period in half, reducing the number of contacts a school can have with a prospect and eliminating boosters from recruiting.

Parrish recognized the measures would save money, but he thinks the educators missed the real issues.

"Let's do some concrete things. Let's eliminate freshman eligibility, which helps the academics of the kid and doesn't put the pressure on the kid who is coming in (to college). Working more with academics and cleaning up recruiting (are the real issues) rather than cutting this and that. I think we have better things to do," Parrish said.

The presidents are hoping the National Collegiate Athletic Association's Presidents Commission will choose to sponsor at its meetings in Kansas City this week cut-back legislation for next January's NCAA convention.

If the Presidents Commission would propose the ACE recommendations at the NCAA convention and the proposal would pass, the earliest the new measures could be put into place is 1987.

K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis was out of town Tuesday, but he expressed mixed feelings concerning the recommendations in Sunday's issue of the Wichita Eagle-Beacon.

"Some of these are legitimate things that need to be looked at," Travis said. "Some are not so legitimate."

If the recommendations would be implemented, Parrish has strong beliefs on its expected impact upon the K-States of the college football world.

"Cutting the scholarships will just help the rich get richer," Parrish said. "I don't think it's fair, and a program which is trying to bring itself up off the deck, like ours, is hurt all the more.

"Take a new staff coming in and that staff has no chance of succeeding. Spring practice gives you a chance to evaluate players," Parrish said. "(And) if spring practice is run properly, it doesn't interfere with academics, and most coaches are aware of that."

Other Big Eight coaches feel the same way about the ACE recommendations as does Parrish. During an Associated Press teleconference Monday, coaches voted 7-0 against the recommendations. Colorado Coach Bill McCartney was not available to give his views.

Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne also believes the presidents' recommendations were actually a way of dodging the real issues at hand.

"I don't understand where they're coming from," Osborne said. "I don't think these proposals are going to cure whatever problems there are in college athletics. The problem is one of integrity and drug education and things that affect society as a whole. You can't pass a few rules like this and all of a sudden expect to cure the problem."

"I wouldn't support any of them," Oklahoma Coach Barry Switzer said. "They're such drastic measures; I'd like to know the mentality, the logic involved.

"I don't know of any major program in the United States that would suppport this. I know football coaches and athletic directors won't."

"I assume they're trying to eliminate some of the problems we currently have in athletics," Kansas Coach Bob Valesente said. "I believe what needs to be done is to look at the scheduling, the time element, in regards to what our athletes are asked to do. I don't believe cutting these programs would serve any purpose to enhance our athletic programs in any way. Drastic moves like this need to be thought out."

Wildcats search for revenge from cross-state rivals

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

The K-State volleyball team is looking for revenge.

The Wildcats will attempt to avenge an earlier defeat at the hands of the Kansas Jayhawks when they travel to Lawrence for a Big Eight match tonight at 8 p.m. The 'Cats lost to the Jayhawks in a non-conference match in four games during the 10th Annual K-State Invitational Sept. 12.

K-State, 0-1 in the conference after a weekend loss to Iowa State, is 6-6 overall.

'We want to go in with a solid first-ball offense, pass the ball and pound it.'

Coach Scott Nelson

"Right now, I would say they are the second best team in the conference behind Nebraska," Coach Scott Nelson said of the Jayhawks, currently 13-2 on the year. "They're a good team. They're solid, and they are playing real well early in the year."

Nelson said his team will have to rely on the powerful hitting of sophomore Shawnee Call and senior Cindy Durham if it hopes to beat the Jayhawks.

"We can't get into a ball-control sort of match. Kansas is better at that sort of game than we are," he said. "We want to go in with a solid first-ball offense, pass the ball and pound it. If they can dig it, great. But as soon as we have another opportunity to attack, we need to attack."

Kansas is a veteran team, returning all six starters from last year's squad. After getting off to a sluggish start as the Jayhawks' coach last year, second-year mentor Frankie Albitz has turned the Kansas squad's fortunes around.

"The one thing that's really helping their program is an enthusiasm for winning and being successful and playing hard as a team together," Nelson said. "They've been downtrodden for a number of years, so a lot of the players that are on the team have suffered."

Kansas is led by the play of sophomore Catalina Suarez. Suarez was a second-team, All-Big Eight selection as a freshman and has continued her impressive play this year.

"(She is) one of the top backcourt players in the country already and one of their leading attacking forces, too," Nelson said. "The thing you try to do as a team against Catalina is not shut her down, it's to control her."

Nelson said that while the Jayhawks may not yet have the talent of perennial conference-power Nebraska, the Jayhawks play together better as a team.

"Kansas' system is the best I've seen in the conference," Nelson said. "In volleyball, your team system gives you a lot of success."

Nelson has been encouraged of late by a couple of developments with his team. One is the recovery and play of senior Helen Bundy, who sat out the first few weeks of the season with a knee injury.

"She's worked her way back into a starting position. She's playing real well to her strengths right now. She's doing what Helen Bundy can do real well," Nelson said. "Definitely, having Helen in there increases our chances to be a little more successful as a team because of her experience."

The other development is the continued improvement of the team's two freshmen setters, Leslie Kull and Kristin Martin.

"Our freshmen setters just continue to improve. They're getting smarter and smarter with their set selection and recognition of offensive situations," Nelson said. "They're coming along at a good pace."

Hurd refuses to stop fighting

By TOM PERRIN
Sports Writer

Jeff Hurd isn't afraid to take on the tough things in life.

Hurd has endured five long years in the K-State football program, suffering through losses, position changes, coaching changes and a series of personal injuries.

All the while, Hurd has refused to allow himself to get down or let up — traits that would run contrary to the way he's learned to respond to adversity. Hurd's philosophy is based primarily on one thing — hard work.

"I was always brought up to work hard at everything that you do," said the Wildcat defensive tackle. "There's a time to work and a time to play. You're supposed to have fun (playing football), but you're also supposed to work hard. I don't believe anything gets done if you're going half speed or dogging it."

While he is termed "a team leader" by Coach Stan Parrish, the soft-spoken Hurd, a recipient of the Paul Coffman Award for outstanding leadership, attitude and improvement, isn't a vocal member of the squad.

"I'm not a player who's going to say, 'Hey, let's go, let's go' and all this," Hurd said. "Maybe one of the players will see me (working hard), and they'll say, 'Hey, he's an older guy and he's doing it. I'm a younger guy and maybe I ought to do it, too.'"

In four games this year, Hurd has 23 tackles, including six solo tackles and two for lost yardage.

When Parrish arrived in Manhattan last December, he made it clear each and every player in the program would have to prove himself all over again. Hurd was one player who won Parrish over right away.

"He's a guy that's going to give you everything he's got all the time. I've got a lot of respect for him," Parrish said. "He does it by example, by hard work and maximum effort.

"He doesn't realize it, but he's been a big asset to the development of our program. For guys like him, the rewards sometimes come down the road to others who have been around him."

That Hurd was still around to play a game for Parrish is a feat in itself. He had knee injuries in both the 1982 and 1985 seasons, and an ankle injury kept him out of action in 1984. Hurd also had to endure two head coaching changes and two position coach changes as well. He also has had to adjust to playing defensive tackle this year after starting at defensive end a year ago.

But Hurd has kept on battling, coming back every time he was dealt a setback. Upon his scheduled graduation in May with a degree in Criminology, Hurd plans to begin a career that will see him dealing with some people who have seen even more difficult times.

Hurd, who grew up in inner-city Kansas City, Mo., plans to return to his old neighborhoods to help troubled youngsters.

"Somehow I was fortunate enough to get a scholarship to come here to play ball," he said. "So, I just want to put something back into where I

Hero's charm offsets predictable plot

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

If you've watched any TV in the past few months, the chances are good you've seen a gentleman with a deep suntan and droll wit inviting you to take a trip down under — 'course you'll have to learn to say

Film Review

"g'day." That gentleman was Paul Hogan. And now you can see him on the big screen in his first major movie, "Crocodile Dundee."

In Australia, the movie has become the all-time box office champ, but will it be a hit in America? Probably so. Hogan has the same easy-going, good-old-boy charm that made Burt Reynolds a star.

In "Crocodile Dundee" Paul Hogan (who also co-wrote the movie) plays the title character — a tough-as-nails crocodile hunter who becomes famous after surviving the attack of an 18-foot crocodile. It seems that while Dundee was "fishing" (crocodile poaching being illegal), a hungry croc' took a bite out of his aluminum boat and then munched on his leg. A week later Dundee pulled himself through the brush and back to civilization. That's the story anyway.

When a young American journalist (Linda Kozlowski) hears about Dundee's experience, she senses a good story and heads down under for the inside scoop.

In the movie's second half, Dundee accepts the invitation from Kozlowski and visits her home turf, Manhattan, N.Y. There, the movie follows our leather-skinned, blonde-haired hero through a series of (mis)adventures in the concrete jungle. He scares off muggers, punches out a pimp, picks up a transvestite and, ultimately, falls in love, to no one's surprise, with the lady journalist.

The movie works best when it doesn't aim for broad comedy but instead allows Dundee's perspective to offer some insights into American life. Kozlowski asks Dundee if he has ever watched TV, and he says,"Yeah, once." He turns on the TV and sees the opening credits for "I Love Lucy."

"Yeah, that's what I saw," he says and turns the TV off again.

The movie's big weakness is the love story itself, which is never convincing. It's especially disappointing because the movie celebrates Dundee's macho values. We're supposed to smile when he says the outback is no place for a woman; it's only for men.

But as in most Burt Reynolds' movies, any critical analysis is virtually irrelevant. The real judge of the movie's value is the general public. That's who the movie is meant to satisfy, not the critics.

Hurd

came from."

Being away from home and coming to K-State has given Hurd a new awareness of the problems in his old neighborhood.

"There's so many young kids around my neighborhood that I didn't realize when I was young," Hurd said. "After my first couple of years here, I saw there were so many kids around the neighborhood on drugs and stuff."

Hurd says being from the inner-city neighborhood gives him a unique opportunity to help back home.

"People always listen to someone who comes from the same place," he said. "They know where you've been and where you're headed, as opposed to someone who comes from outside, like someone who comes in from the suburbs to tell some inner-city kid what he's doing wrong. They'll say, 'Hey, you've never been there; you don't know.' They'll listen more to a guy who comes from there."

While he does have aspirations of playing professional football, Hurd is realistic about the possibilities.

"You never know how it's going to go. Some really good guys never make it," he said. "If a shot to play pro ball comes along, I'll take it. If not, I won't be too downhearted."

City to consider trolley car system

By The Collegian Staff

Heads turned to and people stared at the bright-red trolley coming down the street. As it turned the corner, the clang of the bell could be heard. The trolley may be making its way back to Manhattan.

The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce formed a Trolley Task Force to look into the feasibility of purchasing trolleys for the city. One of the six companies being considered to manufacture the trolleys brought a sample car through Manhattan Tuesday morning.

The task force will make a recommendation to the city by the end of this year, said Becky Blake, task force chairwoman. The committee is also looking into funding, which may be raised through private contributions and tax money, she said.

The trolleys would be used to move special populations, such as convention participants, from one part of the city to another. Blake said the this "would not be a mass transit at all."

The task force is considering purchasing four trolleys for the city. Two of the trolleys would have specific routes in Manhattan, and the other two would be used for local charters, Blake said.

The trolleys with specific routes are expected to make money. Two possibilities to generate income are the anticipated $1 fare and fees paid by advertisers to post ads inside the cars.

Trolleys cost between $50,000 and $150,000 each, said Paul Schultz, a representative of Conrad Fire Equipment. The 34-passenger, oak-trimmed trolley shown to the task force Tuesday had a price tag of $80,000.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Appeals

the traffic appeals board under Johnson's administration.

"It was kind of a fluke how it was discovered," Ott said.

KSU Police records show one student's ticket appeals had been denied by the board. However, the appeal receipt Debbie Wilcott, sophomore in business administration, received showed the appeals had been approved.

Wilcott challenged the payment notice she received from the campus police office by producing her appeal copy. This error was the only way the police department saw the appeal form mailed to Wilcott, Ott said.

The appeal form had a personal note from former board member Dan Stock, 1986 graduate in marketing. The note stated, "We simply cannot go on approving these appeals for excessive traffic violations. However, I'll let you slide this time, but please stay out of trouble in the future. Hope your semester is going well, and tell (your brother) I said hi."

Wilcott said her excuses were valid and she only knew of one ticket Stock had approved. However, records show at least two of her ticket appeals were actually approved.

"He just wrote me a note because he knew my brother and didn't realize I was going to school up here," Wilcott said.

Stock, along with former board member George Heid, 1986 graduate in agricultural economics, received a letter in July from William W. Sutton, vice president for Educational and Student Services. The letter said their actions were a "serious breach of the student honor code that will not be dismissed without reprimand or go unnoticed."

"I didn't even know about Dan's letter," Sommers said. "If we hadn't been so swamped, the mistake wouldn't have even come up."

Approximately 700 appeals were left over from the previous school year. Sommer's committee took the position to not get that far behind, she said.

'If we hadn't been so swamped, the mistake wouldn't have even come up.'

—Susan Sommers

"We set our own guidelines. No one really gave us any instructions except how to fill out the police forms," Sommers said.

Each member handled a stack of appeals. If there were any questions about a decision, it was brought before the whole group for a vote, Sommers said.

"We probably handled 150 appeals a week," Sommers said. "Our meetings were sometimes three hours long."

Sommers said she did not blame anyone on her committee and was proud of the work load they had completed.

Scott Higgason, another member of the former board, said he didn't know about these approvals of personal appeals of board members.

"I'm sure there was approval of friend's tickets, but I don't think it was dishonest," said Higgason, senior in finance. "If we did it, it was valid."

Ott and Johnson met with the former board members last spring to inform them the acceptance of friends' ticket appeals had been uncovered.

"They admitted they had done it," Ott said. "Their personal appeals were lousy excuses, truthfully."

"Our reasons were just as valid as any of the others," Sommers said. "The only fair way to do it is to have anonymous appeals in the future."

There was concern the committee no longer had a police officer sitting in on their weekly meetings last fall semester, Ott said.

"There's supposed to be an officer there," Johnson said.

Beckom said he believes the students, not the police officers, should control the appeals board.

According to the police department, the officer who used to sit on the board has requested retirement.

"He hasn't formally retired yet. He's on leave due to illness," Beckom said. "Someone will be attending those meetings. I usually receive an invitation to their first meeting, and I haven't received notice yet."

The traffic appeals board has met twice so far this semester.
